The Government of Suriname does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Suriname remained on Tier 2. These efforts included increasing law enforcement training, developing a formal victim referral process, increasing funding to the national action plan budget, and government leadership committing to anti-trafficking efforts in public speeches. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. Authorities investigated fewer cases, initiated no prosecutions for two years in a row, did not have a shelter dedicated to trafficking victims, and inconsistently screened vulnerable individuals, often deporting individuals referred to them, including detained migrants.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

Train and support all officials in contact with vulnerable individuals to implement the victim identification and referral protocol to identify trafficking victims, especially among children, migrants from Cuba, Venezuela, Haiti, and other countries. • Increase efforts to investigate, prosecute, convict, and sentence convicted traffickers, including officials complicit in sex or labor trafficking. • Provide vulnerable individuals with trauma-informed assistance, reintegration support, and interpretation in their language prior to, during, and after screening for trafficking. • Train judges at all levels of the judiciary in human trafficking and the trafficking law, and sensitize judges and prosecutors to the issue of secondary trauma. • Prosecute child sex and labor trafficking cases under the trafficking statute, and provide specialized child protection services with trained providers. • Conduct trauma-informed training for police and labor inspectors and hire enough staff to conduct targeted inspections in urban, remote interior, and off-coast fishing locations where trafficking is most likely to occur. • Take steps to eliminate recruitment or placement fees charged to workers by labor recruiters and ensure employers pay any recruitment fees. • Increase grassroots outreach to potential trafficking victims among vulnerable groups by building capacity and collaborating with NGOs. • Develop and execute a robust monitoring and evaluation framework for anti-trafficking policies and efforts.

PROSECUTION

The government maintained prosecution efforts. Article 334 of the criminal code criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of up to nine years’ imprisonment and a fine of 100,000 Surinamese dollars (SRD) ($13,300) for offenses involving a victim 16 years of age or older, and up to 12 years’ imprisonment and a fine of 100,000 SRD ($13,300) for those involving a victim under the age of 16. These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. In January, the government amended the penal code to criminalize the use of electronic communication to schedule sexual encounters with individuals under 16 years old with penalties up to four years in prison with a fine of up to SRD50,000 (US$6,650). Police reported initiating eight investigations (seven for sex trafficking of both adults and minors, and one for labor trafficking of adults), an increase from three investigations in 2018 and 10 in 2017. The labor inspectorate reported investigating a case of potential labor trafficking. The prosecutor’s office did not initiate any new prosecutions during the past two years, compared with four new prosecutions for sex trafficking in 2017. The government reported 18 convictions for human trafficking in 2019 compared with convictions of seven traffickers in 2018 and three in 2017. The government did not report the status of four pending prosecutions involving 12 suspected traffickers initiated in previous years. The government did not report any new investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government employees complicit in trafficking offenses. The head of the Trafficking In Persons (TIP) police unit conducted training sessions outside the capital with 400 participants from the health, immigration, police, customs and District Commissioners offices. The police TIP unit responsible for investigating cases gained a staff member and authorities provided the unit with a new vehicle for investigations outside the capital. In July 2019, a TIP unit member participated in an overseas trafficking training sponsored by another country. In October 2019, 40 officials from immigration, customs, police, the seaport, and airport authorities participated in trafficking awareness training offered by an international organization.

PROTECTION

The government maintained protection efforts. The government initially identified five victims (all female, ages between 14 and 35), from Colombia, the Philippines, and Suriname; upon further examination, three of the five were identified as trafficking victims, compared to one child victim in 2018 and five victims in 2017. All three identified victims and one potential victim from Colombia received referral to a shelter and protective services. The government reported there were no formal written procedures to guide officials in proactive victim identification. The Ministry of Justice and Police worked out a referral process for victims of trafficking, moving them to the Bureau of Victim Services for shelter, medical, counseling and other care funded out of their regular budget. Experts reported that the government did not effectively identify victims among children, migrants in the interior, and in brothels emerging in private homes. The Ministry of Social Affairs drafted a new referral protocol, which did not receive approval by the end of the reporting period. The TIP unit, accompanied by a member of the prosecutor’s office increased inspections of locations where victims might be working such as massage salons and hair salons.

There is no shelter dedicated to trafficking victims—a domestic violence shelter accepted female and child victims but did not accept male victims. Victims could not leave the shelter unchaperoned and had to stay in the shelter or return to their families or their country of origin. Vulnerable individuals who violated the terms of their stay were deported before being screened for trafficking. Victims could apply for temporary or permanent residency whether or not they assisted with trials, although there were no reported cases of victims using either of these provisions. There was no witness protection program although victims in shelters received police protection. Courts implemented a policy of obtaining testimony from victims in the early stages of judicial investigations in case victims were not available during the trial process, although this could weaken testimony in cases where victims were not given time for rehabilitation before providing testimony.

PREVENTION
The government increased prevention efforts. The government reorganized the Ministry of Justice and Police to consolidate anti-trafficking functions and increased funding for the Trafficking In Persons Working Group implementation of the national action plan. In September 2019, the Minister of Justice and Police spoke publicly about ongoing government anti-trafficking efforts, and the government’s commitment to combat trafficking. The government implemented an awareness campaign, including putting up anti-trafficking posters and flyers at schools and police stations, points of entry into the country, and billboards, as well as broadcasting radio and television anti-trafficking sketches in languages of the most vulnerable populations including Creole, Chinese, Portuguese, and Spanish. The government did not conduct research on trafficking during the reporting period. The government consolidated the anti-trafficking hotline to the National Command Center with other anti-trafficking units and trained 17 hotline responders in trafficking awareness, including how to question callers and transfer cases. Labor laws require that all employment agencies were licensed before recruiting domestic and foreign employees, and must receive permission from the Ministry of Labor before entering into work mediation with employees. Labor inspectors received training to identify trafficking victims and were legally authorized to conduct inspections outside formal workplaces, but lacked the manpower and capacity to do so. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Suriname, and traffickers exploit victims from Suriname abroad. Reported cases of trafficking in Suriname’s remote jungle interior, which constitutes approximately 80 percent of the country, have increased in recent years; limited government presence in the interior renders the full scope of the problem unknown. Traffickers target the increasing influx of migrants into Suriname, particularly those from Haiti and Venezuela, as well as those from Brazil, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and Guyana are vulnerable to exploitation by traffickers. Migrant women and girls are especially at risk for sex trafficking in Suriname, including in brothels, massage and hair salons, and illegal gold mining camps in Suriname’s interior. Some Surinamese parents exploit their daughters in sex trafficking. Adult and child migrant workers in agriculture, retail shops, construction, and on fishing boats off Suriname’s coast are at risk of trafficking, as are children working in agriculture, small construction, gold mines, and informal urban sectors. Chinese associations, and allegedly some Hong Kong traffickers, recruit and exploit Chinese immigrants in sex and labor trafficking in the mining, service, and construction sectors. Surinamese women in neighboring countries are at risk of sex trafficking. Traffickers may transport victims through routes in Suriname’s interior that bypass official checkpoints. There are reports of corruption and local official complicity in trafficking crimes that may impede anti-trafficking efforts.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
- Increase efforts to prosecute and convict traffickers using the anti-trafficking statute.
- Ensure adequate financial support for victim services, including funding NGOs for victim assistance.
- Proactively identify trafficking victims, including among asylum-seekers and unaccompanied children.
- Improve coordination within the government, particularly the Gender Equality Agency, to ensure the allocation of adequate financial resources to the implementation of the national action plan.
- Train officials involved in judicial proceedings, particularly judges, on all aspects of trafficking and understanding current anti-trafficking laws.
- Enhance awareness efforts to educate asylum-seekers and unaccompanied children on the risks of sexual exploitation, forced criminality, and forced begging.
- Establish specialized housing for trafficking victims, including for male victims.

PROSECUTION
The government maintained law enforcement efforts, but strengthened anti-trafficking laws. Chapter 4 Section 1a of the Penal Code criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking, and prescribed penalties of two to 10 years’ imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent and, with regard to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Chapter 4 Section 1b criminalized a lesser offense of “human exploitation,” which included the exploitation of individuals for labor or begging, and prescribed penalties of up to four years’ imprisonment; these penalties were also sufficiently stringent. Through a 2019 amendment to the penal code, Chapter 6 Section 9 increased the penalties for the purchase of commercial sex acts from a child from a fine or up to two years’ imprisonment. to a maximum of four years’ imprisonment. In 2019, police investigated 272 trafficking cases (106 sex trafficking, 67 labor trafficking, 99 unconfirmed) and 47 human exploitation cases, compared with 214 and eight, respectively, in 2018. Authorities prosecuted and convicted four traffickers, compared with 17 prosecutions and 15 convictions in 2018. Sentences ranged from eight months’ to four years’ imprisonment. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government employees complicit in human trafficking offenses. According to the migration agency’s trafficking coordinator, a restructuring of the agency, the lack of government funding, and the de-prioritization of training adversely affected its work in 2019. Nonetheless, the agency published a manual for migration agents, providing guidance on how to detect potential trafficking cases, and in 2019, the agency reported 481 suspected cases of trafficking among asylum-seekers, an increase of approximately 25 percent from 2018 (384 cases). Of the new cases, 202 were sex trafficking. During the reporting period, Swedish authorities collaborated with foreign governments on transnational investigations, including a pan-European case led by Europol involving child trafficking, which resulted in 34 arrests.

The National Police offered an online course for police officers and an annual advanced training course for all trafficking police officers and prosecutors. The police trafficking rapporteur conducted training for police and judges. The national courts offered training for judges and lawyers that included sections on sex trafficking and child victims; however, experts reported some judges lacked a sufficient understanding of trafficking cases and current trafficking legislation. The Swedish Coast Guard, police, and customs officials participated in joint regional intelligence operations in trafficking cases involving travel by sea.

PROTECTION

The government maintained victim protection efforts. NGOs identified 162 victims in 2019, and 122 in 2018. Reports indicated tightened migration policy curbed the inflow of asylum-seekers, allowing authorities more time to process and screen applicants for trafficking indicators. Nonetheless, the number of migrants and unaccompanied children seeking asylum remained high (approximately 902), and experts noted that many unaccompanied children were either at risk or victims of trafficking, particularly for sexual exploitation and forced criminality. Of the 481 suspected trafficking cases among asylum-seekers, 92 involved minors—an increase of 44 cases from 2018. Experts noted shortcomings in the proactive identification of unaccompanied children and expressed concern that the number of reported cases misrepresented the real scale of child trafficking in Sweden.

Municipalities, in collaboration with NGOs and other government agencies, provided victim services, including medical and psychological care, shelter, and social assistance. In 2019, the newly created Gender Equality Agency did not fund the national support program (NSP), a civil society platform representing 20 NGOs that provided assistance to victims; funding for the program has fluctuated in previous years—800,000 krona ($86,010) in 2018; no funding in 2017; and 500,000 krona ($53,760) in 2016. The Gender Equality Agency, in its first year amid growing pains and lack of coordination, inadvertently neglected to fund the NSP. Experts expressed concerns the cessation of the NSP’s operation meant that Sweden no longer fulfilled its international commitments regarding assistance to victims because the NSP offered the only effective unconditional assistance provided to victims. Assistance opportunities to victims and their family through municipalities were contingent on victims cooperating with authorities. Municipalities funded assistance and appropriate services. The government subsequently reimbursed the expenses; however, statistics on the costs incurred by the municipalities were unavailable. Although the country lacked shelters dedicated solely to trafficking victims, some municipalities ran shelters offering services to sex trafficking victims. The Gender Equality Agency led a network of approximately 40 NGO-run safe houses, and adult female trafficking victims could receive services at women’s shelters for victims of domestic and honor-related violence. Authorities referred child victims to social services officials, who placed child victims in foster care or group housing. There was no protected housing available to male trafficking victims.

The Aliens Act entitled victims to a 30-day reflection period to contemplate cooperation with law enforcement, during which they were eligible for emergency financial aid; however, only an investigating police officer or prosecutor could file the application, limiting availability to victims already in contact with law enforcement. Victims in trafficking cases who cooperated with authorities received temporary residence permits, which allowed them to seek employment. Forty-four trafficking victims received permits in 2019 (54 in 2018).

PREVENTION

The government maintained prevention efforts. The government implemented its national action plan; however, experts raised concerns regarding the lack of resources dedicated to the plan as demonstrated by the cessation of the NSP. The Gender Equality Agency organized awareness campaigns focusing on safe travel, and authorities conducted or funded awareness training for taxi, hotel, and restaurant staff to detect trafficking at their places of work. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. In 2019, the government allocated 18 million krona ($1.9 million) to strengthen labor market regulation compliance efforts and review compliance developments. Authorities conducted mandatory interviews with foreign workers employed in at-risk sectors and seeking to extend their work permits. The migration agency conducted background checks on companies employing foreign workers and occasionally denied work visas in cases where employment contracts did not meet the necessary requirements. Multiple agencies carried out joint workplace inspections as part of a major EU effort against unfair labor exploitation.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Sweden, and, to a lesser extent, traffickers exploit victims from Sweden abroad. Most traffickers are the same nationality as their victims and are often part of criminal networks engaged in multiple criminal activities, although an increasing number of reported cases involve traffickers who are family members or have no ties to organized crime. Most sex trafficking and labor trafficking victims originate from Eastern Europe, Africa, East Asia, and the Middle East. Reported cases of labor trafficking increased. Victims of labor trafficking, who largely originate from Eastern Europe, East Asia, and West Africa, face exploitation in the service, cleaning, private delivery, and construction industries. Cases among seasonal berry pickers have decreased significantly in recent years; however, individuals mostly from Bulgaria, face exploitation in the agricultural sector. Roma, primarily from Romania and Bulgaria, remain vulnerable to forced begging and criminality and, to a lesser extent, sex trafficking. Asylum-seekers, particularly those from Africa, Eastern Europe, Central Asia, and South America, as well as many stateless individuals, are subjected to human trafficking. In recent years, traffickers subjected Moroccan boys and young men to forced criminal activity, though reports indicate a decline in the number of victims in 2019. Unaccompanied children are especially vulnerable with a majority of suspected child trafficking victims arriving in Sweden as unaccompanied minors, primarily from Africa and the
SWITZERLAND: TIER 1

The Government of Switzerland fully meets the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The government continued to demonstrate serious and sustained efforts during the reporting period; therefore Switzerland remained on Tier 1. These efforts included prosecuting and convicting more traffickers than last reporting period. The government assisted more victims, increased anti-trafficking awareness campaigns, and drafted an anti-trafficking brochure for labor inspectors. Although the government meets the minimum standards, a high number of suspended sentences resulted in 52 percent of convicted traffickers serving no prison time, and only 33 percent were sentenced to one year’s imprisonment or longer, which undercut efforts to hold traffickers accountable, weakened deterrence, and created potential security and safety concerns, particularly for victims who cooperated with investigations and prosecutions. Prosecutions and convictions for labor trafficking remained low compared to sex trafficking and the government did not provide complete data on investigations. The government decreased victim identification, resulting in the fewest victims identified since 2015. Protection services for victims of labor trafficking, men, and children remained inadequate. The government remained without a national standardized identification and referral mechanism and continued to lack legal safeguards to protect trafficking victims against potential prosecution, which sometimes resulted in victim penalization.

PROSECUTION

The government made uneven law enforcement efforts. While the overall number of prosecutions and convictions increased, insufficient sentencing weakened deterrence, prosecutions and convictions for labor trafficking remained low compared to sex trafficking, and the government did not provide complete data on investigations. Article 182 of the penal code criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking, and prescribed penalties of up to life imprisonment and/or a fine; the penalties included prison sentences of no less than one year for offenses involving a child victim and those where the trafficker acted for commercial gain. These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as kidnapping. Inconsistent with the definition of trafficking under international law, Article 182 does not include a demonstration of force, fraud, or coercion as an essential element of the crime. Additionally, both adult and child sex trafficking offenses could be prosecuted under Article 195 of the criminal code (“exploitation of sexual acts” and “encouraging prostitution”), which prescribed penalties of up to 10 years’ imprisonment or fines. NGOs stated the lack of an explicit legal definition for labor exploitation under Article 182 complicated labor trafficking investigations, and limited data collection necessary for prevention efforts. The government did not disaggregate data on law enforcement efforts between sex and labor trafficking.

For the third consecutive year, the government did not provide complete annual investigative data; however, a few notable investigations were reported by the media and NGOs, including conducting a large-scale investigation that involved the forced labor of approximately 50 construction workers who were fraudulently recruited abroad. Cantonal authorities prosecuted 146 defendants in 2019, an increase compared with 124 in 2018 and 143 in 2017. Nigerian sex trafficking victims remained numerous during the reporting period, although there were few corresponding prosecutions involving Nigerian victims. The government convicted 21 traffickers in 2018 (the most recent year for which complete data were available), an increase compared with 13 in 2017. At least 17 of the convictions were for sex trafficking; prosecutions and convictions for labor trafficking remained low during the reporting period, with NGOs asserting many labor trafficking cases were instead pursued as administrative labor code violations, resulting in lesser consequences and decreased deterrence. Of the 21 convictions in 2018, courts fully suspended the prison sentences or fines of nine traffickers (43 percent) and imposed fines with no prison time on two traffickers for sex trafficking (10 percent). Courts issued significant prison sentences to four traffickers (19 percent) and partial prison sentences to six traffickers (28 percent), for a total of 47 percent of traffickers serving prison time, which did not meet the minimum standard. While courts issued several significant prison sentences of up to five and a half years’ imprisonment, of the traffickers sentenced to imprisonment, courts only sentenced 33 percent to one year or longer. A trend of insufficient sentencing practices weakened deterrence, potentially undercut efforts of police and prosecutors, and created potential security and safety concerns, particularly for victims who cooperated with investigations and prosecutions. Of the 13 traffickers convicted in 2017, 38 percent served one year or longer in prison. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of officials complicit in human trafficking offenses.

 Trafficking investigations and prosecutions fell strictly under the jurisdiction of individual cantons, except for cases involving organized criminal networks, which fell under federal police (FedPol) jurisdiction. At least six of 26 cantons had their own specialized anti-trafficking police units. Civil society continued to report the government’s predominant focus on sex trafficking.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

Continue to investigate and prosecute suspected labor and sex traffickers, and sentence convicted traffickers to adequate penalties, which should involve serving significant prison terms.
• Establish a standardized national identification and referral mechanism for all victims.
• Increase victim identification training for all front-line officials, with increased focus on identifying labor trafficking.
• Increase law enforcement efforts for labor trafficking and provide sufficient resources, personnel, and training.
• Increase access to specialized services, especially for labor trafficking victims, asylum-seekers, male, child, and transgender victims.
• Amend the anti-trafficking provision of the criminal code to include force, fraud, or coercion as an essential element of the crime in accordance with international law, and ensure that the criminal code clearly defines labor exploitation.
• Ensure labor trafficking is investigated and prosecuted as a trafficking offense and not pursued as an administrative labor code violation.
• Develop safeguards for victims to protect them against traffickers freed on suspended sentences.
• Enact a legal provision in addition to the existing non-punishment legal norm to protect specifically trafficking victims from prosecution for acts that traffickers coerced them to commit.
• Strengthen international law enforcement cooperation to prevent and investigate child sex tourism.
• Appoint a national rapporteur to provide independent review of government anti-trafficking efforts.

hindered the identification of labor trafficking cases as well as their prosecution. Insufficient personnel, resources, and the absence of a mandate that included human trafficking hampered in-depth labor inspections; additionally, civil society reported labor inspectors frequently regarded foreign victims as criminals working illegally. The government conducted multiple anti-trafficking training events for law enforcement in 2019, including 21 officers from five foreign countries and a roundtable for 40 officials that focused on trafficking in the hospitality sector. In May 2019, the Specialized Unit against the Trafficking in Persons and Smuggling of Migrants (FSMM) and the police held a three-day anti-trafficking training for 29 cantonal police officers, prosecutors, and migration officials. In November 2019, FSMM, in collaboration with two NGOs, held an anti-trafficking training for 141 police officers and prosecutors.

The government continued to facilitate international investigations and criminal trials. Law enforcement assisted in 21 new international trafficking cases during the reporting period, eight of which related to extradition and seven to mutual legal assistance. Through three joint action days between law enforcement, labor inspectors, and EUROPOL in 2019, the government reported conducting at least 145 labor inspections that resulted in the identification of at least five victims, 46 potential victims, and 10 suspected traffickers (compared with the identification of 54 potential victims and seven suspects in 2018). Switzerland had a network of at least 10 police attachés posted abroad, who provided support to government prosecution authorities in combating trans-border crime, including human trafficking. While there were eight suspected child sex tourism cases reported to FedPol during the last reporting period, the government did not report investigating or prosecuting any Swiss nationals for child sex tourism abroad. There were no reported cases of suspected child sex tourism in 2019.

PROTECTION

The government made uneven victim protection efforts. While victim identification decreased and civil society asserted victims were frequently penalized for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, the government reported assisting more victims than last reporting period. Authorities identified fewer victims for the second year in a row, making it the fewest victims identified since 2015. In 2019, cantonal authorities reported identifying 150 victims (170 in 2018), at least 67 of whom were sex trafficking victims (106 in 2018). Of the trafficking victims identified by the government in 2019, 11 were minors and eight were Swiss. The government did not disaggregate data between sex and labor trafficking. The federal government continued to lack national standard victim identification and referral procedures across cantons; however, it distributed a previously updated victim identification checklist to all cantons and relevant organizations in December 2019. Civil society noted concerns regarding the absence of a national victim protection program. Eighteen of 26 cantons had roundtables, which functioned as victim referral mechanisms; roundtables included police, prosecutors, and NGOs. Victim assistance was available in at least 24 out of the 26 cantons, providing a wide-ranging network of care facilities mainly tailored to the needs of women and children; however, trafficking specific services varied from canton to canton. The government provided government-funded trafficking-specific counseling for 184 potential trafficking victims in 2018, compared with 164 in 2017.

The Swiss Victim Assistance Law entitled all adult trafficking victims to access the government-funded women’s shelters or assistance centers for victims of abuse and to special safeguards during criminal proceedings; however, the government did not report how many trafficking victims received shelter or special safeguards during the reporting period. At least four government-funded and NGO-operated shelters continued to provide specialized assistance for victims of trafficking, two of which provided services to children. However, according to GREA and civil society, the government did not have specialized shelters or assistance for child victims of trafficking, nor did it have standardized identification procedures for children. Cantonal authorities maintained jurisdiction on providing protection for victims, and trafficking victims were entitled to free and immediate assistance centers that varied from canton to canton. At least 13 cantons maintained referral agreements with NGO-operated victim assistance facilities that specialized in trafficking. With the noted variances, cantons generally provided victims with a minimum of four weeks of emergency lodging and living allowance, several hours of consultations with a lawyer, mental health counseling and medical treatment, transportation, and translation services. If recovery required more time, the victim assistance law obligated the government to assume the additional cost of longer-term care. Victims had free movement in and out of shelters. While victim assistance was not dependent on cooperation with law enforcement, some NGOs asserted that authorities sometimes used victim penalization to pressure victims into cooperating with law enforcement. In 2019, the government granted 403,290 Swiss Francs ($417,490) to five NGOs for 2020, exceeding its traditional annual allocation of 400,000 Swiss Francs ($414,080); this compared with 373,520 Swiss Francs ($386,670) granted from the 400,000 Swiss Franc ($414,080) allocation in 2019. Federal and cantonal government sources financed the vast majority of a leading NGO’s 2.6 million Swiss Francs ($2.69 million) operating costs for its trafficking victim protection program, the same amount as provided in 2018.

In 2019, a leading government-funded NGO assisted 169 trafficking victims, of which 76 were new victims, 152 were women, 12 transgender, and five male. Fifty-four percent were sex trafficking victims, 13 percent were labor trafficking victims, and the remaining 33 percent were unspecified forms of trafficking. In 2019, 23 percent of the new trafficking victims were from Africa, particularly Nigeria, Eritrea, Ethiopia, and Somalia, and 16 percent were from Eastern Europe, particularly Hungary, Romania, and Bulgaria. This compared with 177 trafficking victims, of whom 80 were new victims, in 2018. A variety of sources referred victims to the NGO, including other NGOs, government-operated counseling centers, government offices, foreign consulates, police and judicial authorities, healthcare sector employees, lawyers, and family. Civil society stated services for labor trafficking victims were limited and the government lacked case management resources for victims in the asylum system. According to NGOs, services for child and male victims were inadequate, especially shelter, counseling, and victim referral resources. The government provided male victims temporary shelter in hotels or government-funded NGO-operated shelters for men.

The government also facilitated assistance to foreign victims of trafficking, which included financial support; however, authorities granted few long-term residency permits and instead provided victims with repatriation assistance to help them return home. In 2019, the government provided repatriation assistance to 27 victims, an increase compared with 17 in 2018; the government provided 32,000 Swiss Francs ($33,130) to an NGO for repatriation assistance in 2019. Cantonal immigration authorities were required to grant victims a minimum 30-day reflection period to decide whether to participate in judicial proceedings against their traffickers, but longer stays generally required cooperation with law enforcement. In 2019, the government granted 52 individuals reflection periods, 77 short-term residence permits, and 14 hardship-based residence permits (56 reflection periods, 91 short-term residence permits, and 16 hardship-based residence permits in 2018). In 2019, an NGO reported that the government...
The government made uneven prevention efforts. Under FedPol, PREVENTION in this regard.

prostitution regulations. GRETA urged the government to adopt charged with violating immigration laws, labor laws, or local coercion often experienced in trafficking cases. NGOs asserted law did not explicitly address human trafficking or the criminal punishment of victims of crimes, the relevant provision of Swiss While the government had a legal norm prohibiting the non-found it difficult to quantify the specific amount of lost income. NGOs and GRETA continued to report asylum accommodations did not provide adequate assistance and counseling services to possible victims. Victim services were only available to victims who experience trafficking within Switzerland; asylum-seekers remained vulnerable as they could be deported back to their first country of EU entrance without first receiving victim protection. GRETA noted cantons often did not transfer victims detected in the asylum system to specialized trafficking victim support centers because of financial constraints but continued to host them in asylum centers. GRETA also noted the lack of adequate accommodation and supervision for children, and lack of a systematic approach; GRETA urged the government to address these issues in its 2019 report. Implementation of the 2019 asylum law aimed to increase the protection of unaccompanied minors and facilitated earlier identification of victims by providing them with free legal representation. However, civil society criticized the government for not systematically referring victims to services once identified and often shifting responsibility to the legal advisor. The victim's legal advisor could refer victims to NGOs for assistance, but the government would often decline to provide financial support, according to an NGO.

 Trafficking victims could request restitution from their trafficker through criminal proceedings, and the government reported awarding restitution to 25 victims in 2018, a slight decrease compared with 31 victims in 2017. GRETA and civil society noted restitution amounts were insufficient, especially compared to other serious crimes such as rape, and traffickers frequently did not pay. Trafficking victims could also pursue damages through a civil case, but the government did not report awarding damages to any victims during the reporting period. Victims could seek compensation from the government if the convicted trafficker was unable to pay the awarded restitution or damages, but the government did not delineate between restitution and compensation, making it unclear how much compensation was provided during the reporting period. GRETA criticized the lack of viable avenues for victim restitution when victims had no verifiable expenses or employment losses because the courts found it difficult to quantify the specific amount of lost income. While the government had a legal norm prohibiting the non-punishment of victims of crimes, the relevant provision of Swiss law did not explicitly address human trafficking or the criminal coercion often experienced in trafficking cases. NGOs asserted that victim penalization was common, with victims frequently charged with violating immigration laws, labor laws, or local prostitution regulations. GRETA urged the government to adopt a provision on the non-punishment of specifically trafficking victims and encouraged additional training of public prosecutors in this regard.

PREVENTION
The government made uneven prevention efforts. Under FedPol, FSMM coordinated national efforts, including anti-trafficking policy, information exchange, cooperation, and training, and convened approximately 12 meetings during the reporting period. Following a 2018 restructuring of the FSMM, civil society and GRETA continued to express concerns regarding a decrease in a victim-centered, multidisciplinary, and collaborative approach to trafficking as well as the halting of much of the 2017-2020 National Action Plan’s implementation. The government remained without an official independent national anti-trafficking rapporteur. An international organization stated the government made little progress implementing the plan during the reporting period; for example, the working groups on training, victim assistance, children and unaccompanied minors, and sensitization of the public sector remained inactive, some since 2017. In 2019, FSMM hosted its sixth national meeting of the heads of the cantonal anti-trafficking roundtables and focused on improving cantonal interaction and coordination on anti-trafficking measures. Authorities continued to report the prevalence of “lover boy” traffickers, which is a method of trafficking that involves young male traffickers, known as “lover boys,” who coerce girls and women into sex trafficking, often through a sham romantic relationship. The national anti-trafficking hotline, operated by a government-funded NGO, reported at least 14 cases in 2019, but authorities estimated there were likely many more unidentified cases. The government increased efforts to raise awareness during the reporting period and FedPol helped carry out several anti-trafficking awareness campaigns. The government produced a video and information leaflet for a campaign targeting victim identification and assistance by healthcare providers, while another campaign for the general public, funded by the government but operated by an international organization, reached approximately 6,000 people. Programs to fund Romanian NGOs providing victim assistance and anti-trafficking assistance to Serbia, Kosovo, Bangladesh, and Nigeria, among others, continued during the reporting period. To minimize the potential for exploitation in the around-the-clock nursing services sector, the government proposed labor contract reforms to the cantons in 2018; in 2019, at least four cantons had enacted new regulations. The government effectively regulated labor recruitment companies during the reporting period; Swiss labor recruitment agencies required a license and were liable if foreign recruitment agencies did not uphold Swiss recruitment regulations. Although fraudulent labor recruitment remained a concern during the reporting period, the government did not report holding any labor recruitment agencies accountable for labor trafficking. Government authorities asserted that labor inspectors continued to lack the mandate to identify trafficking victims and were required to refer potential trafficking cases to police. However, during the reporting period, the government developed a brochure for labor inspectors to assist in the identification of labor trafficking victims. Civil society continued to note concerns regarding the under-prioritization of labor trafficking. The government participated in several programs that aimed to increase awareness of migrant worker’s rights and engaged with the private sector and employers to address improved working conditions, regulatory compliance, and fair recruitment. The government did not demonstrate efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. While the government participated in several international law enforcement efforts to increase government collaboration on child sex tourism, the government did not demonstrate overall efforts to reduce the demand for international sex tourism by Swiss nationals and did not report investigating or holding any suspects from the prior reporting period accountable.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Switzerland. Traffickers can frequently be family members, friends, or romantic partners, as well as agencies offering fraudulent employment, travel, and marriage. Traffickers are both Swiss and foreign nationals; foreign traffickers typically have the same nationality as their victims. Although the vast majority of traffickers are male, female traffickers are not uncommon, especially women from Thailand and Nigeria. Traffickers are increasingly mobile and adaptable, switching industries and locations frequently. Sex traffickers exploit both foreign and domestic women, transgender people, and children. Labor traffickers exploit men, women, and children in domestic service, health care, agriculture, catering, postal courier services, construction, tourism, and in forced criminal activity. Authorities report an increase in young male traffickers, known as “lover boys,” coercing vulnerable Swiss girls and women into sex trafficking, often through a sham romantic relationship. The majority of sex trafficking victims identified by the government are from Eastern Europe, West Africa, notably Nigeria, and Asia, particularly Thailand; traffickers continue to fraudulently recruit and later coerce Nigerian women and girls to stay in exploitative situations using a “voodoo oath” they are forced to swear. Foreign trafficking victims originate primarily from Central and Eastern Europe (particularly Romania, Hungary, and Bulgaria), with increasing numbers from Asia and Africa, especially from Thailand, China, and Nigeria, but also from Latin America, including from Brazil and Dominican Republic. Traffickers often force female victims among asylum-seekers from Nigeria, Eritrea, Angola, and Ethiopia into commercial sex and domestic servitude. Male victims among asylum-seekers come primarily from Eritrea and Afghanistan and are exploited in forced labor.

SYRIA: TIER 3

The Government of Syria does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so; therefore Syria remained on Tier 3. The government did not hold any traffickers criminally accountable, including complicit government officials, nor did it identify or protect any trafficking victims. The government’s actions directly contributed to the population’s vulnerability to trafficking, and it continued to perpetrate human trafficking crimes routinely. During the reporting period, there was a government policy or pattern of recruiting and using child soldiers. The government and pro-Syrian regime-affiliated militias continued to forcibly recruit and use child soldiers, resulting in children facing extreme violence and retaliation by opposition forces; the government also did not protect and prevent children from recruitment and use by armed opposition forces and designated terrorist organizations. The government continued to arrest, detain, and severely abuse trafficking victims, including child soldiers, and punished them for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

Criminalize all forms of human trafficking. • Stop the forcible recruitment and use of child soldiers by government forces and pro-government militias. • Proactively identify victims of all forms of trafficking and provide them with appropriate protection services, including long-term care for demobilized child soldiers. • Ensure trafficking victims are not punished for crimes traffickers compelled them to commit, such as child soldiering. • Investigate, prosecute, and convict perpetrators of sex and labor trafficking and the unlawful recruitment and use of child soldiers, including complicit officials.

PROSECUTION

The government made no discernible anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts, and the government and government-affiliated militias remained complicit in the unlawful recruitment and use of child soldiers. The violent conflict continued to amplify the magnitude of human trafficking crimes occurring within Syria. Decree No. 3 of 2011 appeared to criminalize some forms of sex trafficking and labor trafficking, but it did not include a clear definition of human trafficking. This decree prescribed a minimum punishment of seven years’ imprisonment and a fine between one million and three million Syrian pounds ($2,300 and $6,900), a penalty that was sufficiently stringent but, with respect to sex trafficking, not commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Law No.11/2013 criminalized all forms of recruitment and use of children younger than the age of 18 by the Syrian armed forces and armed groups; however, the government made no efforts to prosecute child soldiering crimes perpetrated by government and pro-regime militias, armed opposition groups, and designated terrorist organizations. The government did not report investigating, prosecuting, or convicting suspected traffickers, nor did it investigate, prosecute, or convict government officials complicit in human trafficking. The government did not provide anti-trafficking training for officials.

PROTECTION

The government did not identify or protect trafficking victims. The government did not protect children from forcible recruitment and use as soldiers and in support roles by government forces and pro-government armed groups, armed opposition groups, and terrorist organizations. The government continued to severely punish victims for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, such as child soldiering and prostitution. The government routinely arrested, detained, raped, tortured, and executed children for alleged association with armed groups and made no effort to offer these children any protection services. During the reporting period, the government also detained thousands of foreign women and children—including unaccompanied children—across northeastern Syria for suspected family ties to foreign Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) fighters; some of these individuals may have been unidentified trafficking victims. The government neither encouraged trafficking victims to assist in investigations or prosecutions of their traffickers nor provided foreign victims with legal alternatives to their removal to countries in which they may face hardship or retribution.

PREVENTION

The government made no effort to prevent human trafficking; the government’s actions continued to amplify the magnitude of human trafficking crimes in the country. The government did not implement measures to prevent children from unlawful recruitment and use as combatants and in support roles by government, pro-regime militias, opposition armed groups, and terrorist organizations. The government did not raise awareness of human trafficking among the general public or officials. The government did not report efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts, nor did it prevent child sex tourism by Syrian nationals abroad. The government did not provide anti-trafficking training for its diplomatic personnel.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Syria, and traffickers exploit Syrian victims abroad. The situation in Syria continues to deteriorate amid the ongoing conflict with sub-state armed groups of varying ideologies exerting control over wide geographic swathes of the country’s territory. As of December 2019, human rights groups and international organizations estimate between 220,000 and 550,000 people have been killed since the beginning of protests against the Bashar al-Assad regime in March 2011. This vast discrepancy is due in large part to the number of missing and disappeared Syrians, whose fates remain unknown. More than half of Syria’s pre-war population of 23 million has been displaced; as of February 2019, more than 5.6 million have fled to neighboring countries and, as of December 2019, approximately 6.62 million are internally displaced. Syrians that remain displaced in the country and those living as refugees in neighboring countries are extremely vulnerable to traffickers. Syrian children are reportedly vulnerable to forced early marriages, including to members of terrorist groups such as ISIS—which can lead to commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor—and children displaced within the country continue to be subjected to forced labor, particularly by organized begging rings.

Despite the territorial defeat of ISIS at the beginning of 2019, it continued to force local Syrian girls and women in ISIS-controlled areas into marriages with its fighters, and it routinely subjected women and girls from minority groups into forced marriages, domestic servitude, systematic rape, and other forms of sexual violence. Incidents of human trafficking increased, and trafficking victims were trapped in Syria, particularly when ISIS consolidated its control of the eastern governorates of Raqqa and Deir al-Zour in 2014. In December 2014, ISIS publicly released guidelines on how to capture, forcibly hold, and sexually abuse female slaves. As reported by an international organization in 2015, ISIS militants’ system of organized sexual slavery and forced marriage is a central element of the terrorist group’s ideology. As of the end of 2019, according to the Iraqi Kurdistan Regional Government, approximately 3,000 Yazidi women and girls remain missing; reports indicate some of these women and girls remained with ISIS in eastern Syria or were held in Al-Hol. In June 2019, international media reported that a group of 21 women and children were rescued from ISIS in Syria and returned to Iraq, as confirmed by the Kurdish Regional Government.

The recruitment and use of children in combat in Syria remains commonplace, and since the beginning of 2018 international observers reported a continuation in incidents of recruitment and use by armed groups. Syrian government forces, pro-regime militias, and armed non-state actors, including the Free Syrian Army (FSA) and FSA-affiliated groups, Kurdish forces, ISIS, Hayat Tahrir al-Sham, al-Qa’ida, and Jabhat al-Nusra—the al-Qa’ida affiliate in Syria—recruit and use boys and girls as child soldiers. Jabhat al-Nusra and ISIS also have used children as human shields, suicide bombers, snipers, and executioners. Militants also use children for forced labor and as informants, exposing them to retaliation and extreme punishment. Some armed groups fighting for the Syrian government, such as Hezbollah, and pro-regime militias known as the National Defense Forces (NDF), or “shabiba,” forcibly recruit children as young as six years old. ISIS actively deploys children—some as young as eight years old—in hostilities, including coercing children to behead Syrian government soldiers; the terrorist group has deliberately targeted children for indoctrination and used schools for military purposes, endangering children and preventing their access to education. Before the liberation of Raqqa in October 2017, ISIS operated at least three child training camps in the city, where it forced children to attend indoctrination seminars and promised children salaries, mobile phones, weapons, a martyr’s place in paradise, and the “gift” of a wife upon joining the terrorist group. The Kurdish People’s Protection Units (YPG and YPJ) in northwest Syria continued to recruit, train, and use boys and girls as young as 12 years old; since 2017, international observers reported that YPG and YPJ recruit—at times by force—children from displacement camps in northeast Syria. In June 2019, the Syrian Democratic Forces (SDF) and by association—the YPG and YPJ—took steps to end the recruitment and use of children and demobilize children within SDF ranks after adopting a UNSCR-mandated action plan. Several credible sources continue to widely report that Iran’s Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) and the Iranian Basij Resistance Force (Basij) actively recruit and use—through force or coercive means—Afghan children and adults, Afghan migrant and refugee men and children living in Iran, and Iranian children, to fight in IRGC-led and-funded Shia militias deployed to Syria.

The Syrian refugee population is highly vulnerable to sex trafficking and forced labor in neighboring countries, particularly Jordan, Lebanon, Iraq, and Turkey. International organizations report a high number of child and early marriages of Syrian girls among refugee populations, which increases their vulnerability to trafficking. Syrian refugee women and girls are also vulnerable to forced or “temporary marriages”—for the purpose of commercial sex and other forms of exploitation—and sex trafficking in refugee camps, Jordan, and cities in the Iraqi Kurdistan Region (IKR), including Sulaimaniya. Illicit prostitution rings in Turkey and Lebanon compel Syrian refugee women and girls into sex trafficking. In Turkey, some female Syrian refugees are reportedly exploited in sex or labor trafficking after accepting fraudulent job offers to work in hair salons, modeling, entertainment, or domestic work. In Turkey, Lebanon, and Jordan, Syrian refugee children continue to engage in street begging or peddling goods, some of which may be forced or coerced. Syrian children are also observed working in Turkey’s agricultural sector and informally in textile workshops and the service sector, where they experience long working hours, low wages, and poor working conditions; children in these sectors may be vulnerable to forced labor. In Jordan and Lebanon, traffickers force Syrian refugee children to work in agriculture alongside their families; in Lebanon’s Bekaa Valley, Syrian gangs force refugee men, women, and children to work in agriculture under harsh conditions, including physical abuse, with little to no pay. LGBTI persons among the Syrian refugee population in Lebanon are reportedly vulnerable to sex trafficking.

TAIWAN: TIER 1

Taiwan authorities fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Authorities continued to demonstrate serious and sustained efforts during the reporting period; therefore Taiwan remained on Tier 1. These efforts included improved interagency coordination to combat trafficking; new policy initiatives intended to streamline investigations; continued oversight of vulnerable labor recruitment channels; and increased inspections and investigatory referrals of potential forced labor cases on fishing vessels. Although Taiwan met the minimum standards, significant challenges remained unaddressed. Official stakeholders operated under disparate and often ineffective victim identification procedures, complicating some victims’ access to justice and protective care. Insufficient staffing and inspection protocols continued to impede efforts to combat forced labor on Taiwan-flagged and-owned fishing vessels in the highly vulnerable Distant Water Fleet (DWF). Thousands of migrant domestic caregivers remained at higher risk of exploitation in the absence of specific legislation ensuring their labor rights.

Taiwan authorities continued to demonstrate serious and sustained efforts during the reporting period; therefore Taiwan remained on Tier 1. These efforts included improved interagency coordination to combat trafficking; new policy initiatives intended to streamline investigations; continued oversight of vulnerable labor recruitment channels; and increased inspections and investigatory referrals of potential forced labor cases on fishing vessels. Although Taiwan met the minimum standards, significant challenges remained unaddressed. Official stakeholders operated under disparate and often ineffective victim identification procedures, complicating some victims’ access to justice and protective care. Insufficient staffing and inspection protocols continued to impede efforts to combat forced labor on Taiwan-flagged and-owned fishing vessels in the highly vulnerable Distant Water Fleet (DWF). Thousands of migrant domestic caregivers remained at higher risk of exploitation in the absence of specific legislation ensuring their labor rights.
PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Increase efforts to prosecute and convict traffickers under the anti-trafficking law. • Sentence convicted traffickers to adequate penalties, which should include significant prison terms. • Increase inspections and, where appropriate, prosecute the senior crew and owners of Taiwan-owned and -flagged fishing vessels suspected of forced labor in the DWF, including vessels stopping in special foreign docking zones. • Enact and implement policies to expedite maritime forced labor investigations and reduce suspect flight. • Conduct comprehensive, victim-centered interviews to screen foreign fishing crewmembers for forced labor indicators during portside and at-sea vessel inspections. • Train maritime inspection authorities on victim identification, referral, and law enforcement notification procedures. • Formally include civil society input into the labor broker evaluation process. • Amend relevant policies and legislative loopholes to eliminate the imposition of all recruitment and service fees and deposits on workers, and by coordinating with sending countries to facilitate direct hiring. • Strengthen oversight of all foreign worker recruitment and placement agencies and processes to screen for abuse indicators, including illegal fee requirements and contract discrepancies. • Strengthen efforts to screen for trafficking among vulnerable populations, including foreign students recruited to for-profit universities; individuals returned to Taiwan in connection with alleged overseas criminal activity; and foreign workers falling out of visa status within Taiwan after fleeing abusive working conditions and/or surrendering to immigration authorities under the voluntary departure program, and refer them to protective services. • Allocate increased resources for and streamline the maritime inspection process by requiring DWF vessels to use standard international maritime call signs, and by registering all Taiwan-owned and -flagged fishing vessel names, licenses, authorized operation areas, and foreign-hired crew manifests in a single, standardized database system. • Clearly define roles and responsibilities for, and increase coordination between, the agencies that oversee Taiwan-owned and -flagged fishing vessels. • Enact legislation that would address gaps in basic labor protections for household caregivers and domestic workers. • Enact a full ban on the retention of migrant workers’ identity and travel documentation. • Extend trafficking victim identification authority to key stakeholder agencies. • Increase resources for and implement anti-trafficking training for police, prosecutors, and judges. • Strengthen efforts to publicize the foreign worker trafficking hotline number among migrant crewmembers of Taiwan-owned and -flagged fishing vessels.

PROSECUTION
Authorities maintained law enforcement efforts. The Human Trafficking Prevention and Control Act (HTPCA) criminalized all forms of trafficking and prescribed penalties of up to seven years’ imprisonment and fines up to five million New Taiwan Dollars (NT) ($166,990); these penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Observers noted ambiguities in HTPCA provisions complicated implementation in cases where victims received some financial compensation. Other HTPCA provisions protected laborers from having to remit “unreasonable payments of debt” to brokers or supervisors; observers expressed concern that these provisions were too vague to effectively prevent debt-based coercion. HTPCA amendments enacted in 2018 increased penalties to a maximum of one year in prison and a possible fine of 300,000 NT ($10,020) for individuals who, “through recruitment, seduction, shelter, arrangement, assistance, exploitation, or other means, cause a child to act as a host or hostess in a bar or club or engage in acts associated with tour escort and singing or dancing companion services that involve sexual activities.” The amendment prescribed a maximum penalty of five years’ imprisonment and a possible fine of 1.5 million NT ($50,100) for such crimes committed by means of “violence, coercion, drugs, fraud, hypnosis, or other means violating the free will of the child or youth concerned.” To address some of the aforementioned shortcomings, an interagency working group continued to seek civil society input into additional draft amendments to the HTPCA, which remained in process at the end of the reporting period. Authorities continued to prosecute the majority of trafficking cases under other laws in the criminal code and the Child and Youth Sexual Exploitation Prevention Act (CYSEPA); some penalties prescribed for child sex trafficking offenses under these laws were not sufficiently stringent or commensurate with other grave crimes, such as rape, although other laws retained appropriate penalties.

Authorities conducted 143 trafficking investigations (32 labor trafficking and 111 sex trafficking) in 2019, compared with 166 total investigations in 2018 and 125 in 2017. Authorities newly prosecuted 122 individuals in 2019 (compared with 113 total in 2018, 248 in 2017, and 128 in 2016). This figure included 48 individuals tried under the CYSEPA, 23 under the HTPCA, and 51 under other laws and sections of the criminal code. The 23 individuals tried under HTPCA included nine charged with sex trafficking and 14 charged with labor trafficking. Authorities obtained a total of 50 convictions, including seven convictions for forced labor and 43 for sex trafficking (50 total in 2018 and 62 in 2017). In one illustrative case in December, a Kaohsiung court concluded prosecutions initiated in 2017 against 19 individuals for allegedly subjecting over 80 foreign fishermen to forced labor; seven of the defendants were convicted and sentenced to prison terms ranging from 10 to 18 months. In prior years, authorities ascribed the tendency to impose lenient penalties to Taiwan’s judicial evaluation and promotion system, which reportedly penalized judges if courts granted convicted individuals’ appeals to overturn or shorten their sentences. However, for the second consecutive year, sentences imposed on the majority of convicted traffickers (at least 27) were greater than one year imprisonment. Authorities continued to train law enforcement officers, prosecutors, and judges through a wide range of workshops, seminars, and conferences. Nonetheless, authorities and NGOs noted court personnel perceiving cases as labor disputes rather than trafficking crimes hindered effective prosecution of labor trafficking cases. Labor rights groups alleged some low-level corruption among local officials impeded action against forced labor in the fishing industry. Authorities did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of officials complicit in human trafficking offenses. Despite international law enforcement challenges presented by Taiwan’s unique diplomatic status, authorities successfully conducted joint anti-trafficking investigations with Vietnam and Belgium.

Authorities reported 2,813 inspections of recruitment brokers in 2019 (compared with 2,827 in 2018; 2,701 in 2017; 2,429 in 2016; and 1,822 in 2015). However, unlike last year, they did not report any criminal investigations, prosecutions, convictions, or incarcerations of brokers engaged in illegal acts contributing to trafficking vulnerabilities. The Fisheries Agency (FA) reported conducting random inspections on 198 fishing vessels at domestic ports, foreign ports, and for the second consecutive year, on the high seas (139 in 2018; unreported in 2017). Inspectors uncovered 88 violations relating to contract issues, excessive overtime, and wage discrepancies (120 in 2018); authorities referred six of these vessels to prosecutors for investigation into possible violations of the Human Trafficking Prevention Act (three in 2018). Despite some improvements, civil society groups continued to decry systemic shortcomings in Taiwan’s maritime anti-trafficking law enforcement, exacerbated by DWF ships’ ability to operate without using standard international registration systems and by the absence of a single electronic database containing vessel names, licenses, crew manifests, and authorized areas of operation. Division of responsibility for foreign fishermen between the Ministry of Labor (MOL) and the FA continued to hinder prosecution of maritime forced labor. According to judicial officials, bureaucratic lags generated by complicated reporting hierarchies also impeded timely law enforcement response in maritime cases, allowing some alleged perpetrators to flee long before the competent authorities could begin formal investigations. In an effort to mitigate these delays, Taiwan’s interagency anti-trafficking task force worked with the FA to produce a draft policy granting police the authority to initiate maritime forced labor investigations immediately upon receipt of complaints, rather than following lengthier bureaucratic approval processes. The policy remained in draft at the end of the reporting period.

PROTECTION

Authorities maintained protection efforts. By law, only police and prosecutors could formally identify victims, while MOL, the FA, the National Immigration Agency (NIA), and other relevant stakeholders were required to follow complex notification procedures to report possible victim status. NGOs and prosecutors believed some victims went undetected under this arrangement; as such, they continued to advocate for authorities to allow social workers, labor inspectors, immigration officials, and other stakeholders to independently identify victims as well. NGOs also continued to report cases in which judges disagreed with law enforcement officers’ or prosecutors’ prior identification of victims and therefore dismissed relevant trafficking charges. Law enforcement authorities used standardized questions and evaluation forms when interviewing and referring potential trafficking victims, including among foreigners accused of having committed immigration violations. During the reporting period, they identified 300 trafficking victims (198 exploited in sex trafficking and 102 in forced labor), of which they referred 202 to shelters for assistance, compared with 302 identified and 216 referred to shelters in 2018. Of the 300 victims identified, 169 were foreign and 98 were children.

NGOs and official stakeholders continued to stress the need for Taiwan to pass a long-stalled domestic worker protection bill that would mandate hours of rest, days off, and annual leave. Amendments to the Employment Services Act that entered into force during the previous reporting period required employment agencies to report abuses their clients committed against migrant workers—especially foreign household caregivers—or face severe fines. The amendments also banned employers from retaining passports, work permits, or any identity documents of migrant domestic workers and fishermen without their consent. Civil society groups argued these amendments were insufficient to deter forced labor, as employers were reportedly able to threaten migrant workers into “voluntarily” turning over their identity documentation. Lawmakers reported easing respite care regulations in 2018 to encourage employers to grant workers annual leave, ostensibly mitigating a key freedom of movement concern for migrant workers employed as household caregivers. However, NGOs claimed these legislative reforms did little to enhance migrant domestic worker protections in implementation; instead, they called for an amendment to bring migrant domestic workers under the broader protections and jurisdictions outlined in Taiwan’s Labor Standards Act.

NIA operated two shelters dedicated to foreign trafficking victims who had not acquired work visas. Citing security concerns, authorities limited shelter access for victims from the People’s Republic of China to NIA shelters, while other nationals could access a wider array of NGO shelter services. MOL significantly increased its budget for overall victim protection to 18 million NT ($601,160) in 2019 under Taiwan’s Employment Security Fund (10.75 million NT ($359,030) in 2018 and 10.34 million NT ($345,330) in 2017), of which it used 6.84 million NT ($228,440); NIA also spent 13.52 million NT ($451,540) for operation of the two shelters. NIA shelters provided both male and female trafficking victims with medical and psychological services, legal counseling, vocational training, small stipends, language interpretation, and repatriation assistance; authorities reported offering these services to a total of 2,697 foreign individuals, among whom 1,081 received interpretation assistance and 14 received legal aid (unreported in 2018). MOL subsidized an additional 22 “resettlement facilities” and operated a 24-hour hotline that trafficking victims could access; it received two calls related to possible sex trafficking and three related to suspected cases of forced labor (60 total in 2018). Unlike in prior years, MOL reported successfully identifying one forced labor victim through the hotline and referring the individual to protection services. Observers noted that migrant crewmembers aboard vessels in the DWF may have had difficulties accessing hotlines due to limited awareness of their existence and restrictions on their communication imposed by senior vessel crew. NIA also ran a 24-hour Chinese-English hotline, through which it received and investigated nine reports of possible sex trafficking and 11 reports of suspected forced labor; this led to the positive identification and referral of one victim (none in 2018). The National Police Agency also maintained a hotline, through which it reportedly identified and referred five victims of trafficking.

Civil society contacts continued to call for expansion of formal victim designation authority in order to enhance identification through these and other channels.

Authorities encouraged victims to participate in their traffickers’ criminal investigations by allowing them to testify outside of the courtroom or through video equipment. During the reporting period, the Judicial Yuan collected feedback from civil society organizations on enhancing victim participation in litigation procedures. This consultative process culminated in amendments to the code of criminal procedure requiring judges to protect the identities of victims and their families, including by separating victims from the accused during trial proceedings. The amendments also newly established that victims, or their representatives, can question defendants, and that they can formally express their opinions on all evidence presented and sentences imposed as part of the litigation process. Authorities conferred 56 temporary residence permits and 57 temporary work permits to foreign victims—a decrease from 90 and 88, respectively in 2018, and 126 and 159, respectively in 2017—but they extended 107 temporary residence permits conferred in a previous reporting period (unreported in 2018). MOL authorities provided repatriation assistance to 21 Taiwan victims overseas under the auspices of work visas, and NIA reported providing repatriation assistance to 38 Taiwan victims without work visas (66 total in 2018; 39 total in 2017). Authorities permitted victims to obtain compensation through out-of-court settlements or file civil suits against traffickers but required them to provide all relevant evidence themselves. The Legal Aid Foundation, which the Judicial Yuan funded, continued to seek compensation for hundreds of Indonesian caregivers subjected to wage withholding by an unscrupulous broker prior to the enactment of the HTPCA in 2008. At year’s end, 254 valid applicants had settled with the accused and received an unspecified amount of compensation.
District courts accepted five additional civil suits related to trafficking, four of which they concluded in favor of the plaintiffs with compensation orders totaling over 18.7 million NT ($624,540).

Taiwan’s Labor Standards Act did not protect fishing workers hired overseas, who instead fell under the jurisdiction of the FA. The FA maintained regulations that standardized fishing workers’ employment contracts, set a minimum wage with direct payment options, provided medical and life insurance, unified working hours and rest time, and established access to new complaint mechanisms. However, NGOs remained concerned that the minimum compensation established in these regulations remained below Taiwan’s broader minimum wage and that senior vessel crew continued to delay or withhold salary remittance in violation of contractual pay schedules, leaving some foreign fishing workers vulnerable to debt-based coercion. Civil society contacts described the FA’s purview over Taiwan fishermen’s associations—which played a role in the approval of labor recruitment systems—as a possible conflict of interest. Some anti-trafficking activists alleged harassment by fishermen’s associations purported to have close ties with local FA authorities. Observers reported insufficient FA oversight mechanisms in the DWF were permissive of forced labor and other abuses. In an effort to enhance this oversight, authorities passed a resolution outlining legislative “harmonization” with the contents of the International Labor Organization’s Work in Fishing Convention (C188); the new language required standardized working conditions and benefits and raised the minimum wage for DWF and near-water migrant fishermen. However, implementation measures remained under consideration at the end of the reporting period. Proposed amendments to the HTPCA improving the victim identification process and expanding victim benefits, including by increasing visa validity to trigger eligibility for national health insurance, remained in draft at the end of the reporting period for a second year.

Taiwan law provided victims with immunity for unlawful acts their traffickers compelled them to commit. Although there were no new allegations of victim penalization in 2019, civil society contacts reported limited or inconsistent understanding of trafficking among front-line law enforcement officers and judges, compounded by high turnover impacting institutional memory, continued to leave victims vulnerable to temporary detention, fines, and jail time. In 2018, authorities detained and initiated criminal investigations into 32 Taiwan individuals formally identified by the Slovenian government as victims of forced criminality in telephone scam operations. Taiwan authorities rejected their prior victim designation, after district attorneys conducted two interviews during which they reported carrying out standard victim identification procedures. In 2019, authorities began prosecuting the leaders of the scam under the HTPCA. Judicial officials reported initiating prosecutions against all 32 of these workers on the grounds that they had allegedly entered into the scam of their own volition and were subsequently forced to continue the work; however, citing their “simultaneous victim status,” authorities prosecuted them under charges carrying lesser penalties. The cases were in process at the end of the reporting period.

PREVENTION

 Authorities increased some efforts to prevent trafficking. A cabinet-level minister-without-portfolio continued to implement the national plan of action and oversee an interagency working group that met semiannually. The working group maintained two subgroups—one to focus on domestic workers and the other on migrant fishermen—that convened meetings more frequently and included participation from NGOs and academics. Various agencies continued to fund advertisements, public service announcements, and other materials on trafficking and held trainings for vulnerable populations, including youth, foreign workers, and fishing sector workers. The FA distributed multilingual cards containing information on worker rights and hotline numbers to foreign crewmembers during random inspections of ships docking at certain foreign ports. Authorities continued to operate international airport service counters and foreign-worker service stations around Taiwan to assist foreign workers and educate them on their rights. The FA conducted 199 random inspections of fishing vessels—82 in domestic ports, 74 at foreign ports, and 43 on the high seas—employing a total of approximately 3,500 foreign crewmembers (139 vessels involving 798 crewmembers in 2018; unreported in 2017).

Regulations promulgated in 2017 ostensibly aimed at better protecting foreign fishermen contained provisions allowing brokers to charge unlimited fees for recruitment and unspecified “reasonable service items,” which likely perpetuated debt-based coercion. During the reporting period, MOL commissioned a local university to conduct a study on the efficacy of these regulations in protecting foreign workers hired overseas into Taiwan’s fishing industry; the study issued several recommendations to improve hiring procedures and oversight into labor conditions. The FA also amended the regulations in October 2019 to strengthen language requiring brokers and/or vessel owners to explain crewmembers’ rights prior to signature of contracts.

In an effort to reduce dependence on recruitment brokers, MOL held informational sessions to educate members of various industries on direct hiring options. An online direct hiring service center allowed employers to hire foreign workers without utilizing brokers who may charge illegally excessive fees; however, a relatively small number of employers listed vacancies through the service, and NGOs reported it was seldom in use. Authorities also began piloting a small direct-hire program to bring foreign workers into Taiwan’s agricultural sector, but civil society contacts claimed the program had benefited only a handful of Indonesian migrant workers and was not designed to adequately screen for sending countries’ compliance with recruitment fee elimination or other vulnerabilities. Most employers continued to deem it easier and more expedient to use brokers, and labor rights groups continued to call on the authorities to eliminate legal loopholes that enable excessive fees. Taiwan maintained a broker evaluation system initiated in 2015 that could revoke the business licenses of low-scoring brokerage firms and impose fines for certain violations, including imposition of illegal fees. However, civil society observers were concerned it could not be sufficiently objective or accurate in detecting abuses, including forced labor, because the authorities provided brokers with advance notification prior to inspections. Human rights NGOs claimed the system would be more effective with unannounced inspections and if the authorities granted NGOs a role in the formal approval and licensure review process. The FA reported inspecting 43 recruitment agencies, of which it fined two (four in 2018; six in 2017) and suspended two businesses for various violations (seven in 2018; five in 2017). Taiwan’s laws criminalized sexual exploitation of children by Taiwan passport holders traveling abroad, but authorities have not investigated or prosecuted any child sex tourism offenses committed abroad since 2006. Authorities have signed memorandums of understanding on trafficking prevention with 20 countries, but contacts report Taiwan’s unique diplomatic status limited opportunities for bilateral or multilateral cooperation. Among these agreements, some did not outline adequate screening for forced labor aboard Taiwan-owned or -flagged vessels docking at certain designated foreign vessel harbor areas. Authorities made efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts, including through Tourism Bureau awareness campaigns and industry training sessions. To reduce vulnerability to immigration-based coercion, NIA continued implementing a “voluntary departure program” initiated in 2018 offering reduced penalties to foreign individuals overstaying their visas, including a small fine without detention and a shorter re-entry ban, if they willingly turned themselves in. More than 26,000 foreign nationals benefited from this program during the first half of 2019—a significant increase from 2,300 in early 2019; authorities reported carrying out standard trafficking victim identification procedures among these individuals, but they did not report identifying or referring any victims to protection services as part of the process. NIA published print and television advertisements explaining the process in several key demographic languages and established a hotline for self-reporting.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported in the last five years, human traffickers subject foreign men and women to forced labor and sex trafficking in Taiwan, and traffickers subject local men and women to forced labor and local women and children to sex trafficking. Taiwan women and children are subjected to domestic sex trafficking, including as part of an increasing trend in which traffickers induce and exploit Taiwanese and foreign women’s and children’s drug addictions. Taiwan traffickers increasingly use the internet, smartphone apps, livestreaming, and other such online technologies to conduct recruitment activities, often targeting child victims, and to mask their identities from law enforcement. Taiwan traffickers also exploit persons with disabilities in sex trafficking.

Traffickers lure women from China and Southeast Asian countries to Taiwan through fraudulent marriages and deceptive employment offers for purposes of sex trafficking. Many trafficking victims are migrant workers from Indonesia, the Philippines, Thailand, Vietnam, and, to a lesser extent, individuals from China, Cambodia, and Sri Lanka. Taiwan is host to more than 700,000 foreign workers, most of whom are hired in their home countries through recruitment agencies and brokers—including some from Taiwan—to perform low-skilled work as home caregivers and domestic workers, or in farming, manufacturing, meat processing, construction, and fishing. In order to pay brokers’ often exorbitantly high recruitment fees and deposits, some foreign workers incur substantial debts, which the brokers or employers use as tools of coercion to obtain or retain their labor. After recruitment fee and guarantee deposit repayments are garnished from their wages, many foreign workers in Taiwan earn significantly less than the minimum wage. Foreign workers who leave their contracted positions—nearly 50,000 at any given time—are at particularly high risk of trafficking because they lose their immigration status and access to formal sector employment; some of them initially flee due to abusive work conditions, including forced labor. Domestic workers and home caregivers are also especially vulnerable to exploitation, since they often live in their employers’ residences, making it difficult to monitor their working and living conditions. One NGO survey found that 90 percent of all migrant domestic caregivers have their travel and identity documents withheld by their employers as a coercive measure. Brokers in Taiwan sometimes assist employers in forcibly deporting “problematic” foreign employees should they complain, enabling brokers to fill the empty positions with new foreign workers facing continued debt-based coercion. Some traffickers use Indonesian-owned stores in Taiwan as illegal remittance channels, confining Indonesian workers and subjecting them to sex trafficking. Traffickers reportedly take advantage of Taiwan’s “New Southbound Policy” visa-simplification program to lure Southeast Asian students and tourists to Taiwan and subject them to forced labor and sex trafficking. According to NGOs, more than 200 for-profit universities in Taiwan have begun aggressively recruiting foreign students—particularly Indonesians—and subsequently placing them into exploitative labor conditions under the pretense of educational opportunities. These students are often unaware of the work component prior to arrival and reportedly experience contract switching, prohibitive working hours, and poor living conditions contrary to their original agreements.

Documented and undocumented Chinese, Indonesian, Filipino, and Vietnamese fishermen working on Taiwan-owned and -flagged fishing vessels experience non- or under-payment of wages, long working hours, physical abuse, lack of food or medical care, denial of sleep and standard safety equipment, and poor living conditions while indebted to complex, multinational brokerage networks. Migrant fishermen have reported senior crewmembers employ such coercive tactics as threats of physical violence, beatings, withholding of food and water, retention of identity documents, wage deductions, and non-contractual compulsory sharing of vessel operational costs to retain their labor. These abuses are particularly prevalent in Taiwan’s DWF, comprising approximately 1,400 Taiwan-owned and -flagged fishing vessels operating thousands of miles from Taiwan and without adequate oversight. Senior crew force migrant workers to fish illegal stock, including threatened, endangered, and protected species, placing them at higher risk of criminal repercussions. Many ships remain at sea for years at a time, selectively disabling their transponders and stopping at “refrigeration mother ships” or remote, uninhabited islands to resupply, transfer victims to other ships, and offload illegally caught fish while avoiding detection by law enforcement. According to FA estimates, approximately 8,000 Filipinos and more than 20,000 Indonesians work onboard DWF vessels. Men and women from Taiwan engaged in telephone scams overseas reportedly present indicators of trafficking.

TAJIKISTAN: Tier 2

The Government of Tajikistan does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Tajikistan remained on Tier 2. These efforts included prosecuting significantly more traffickers, assisting more victims in the state-run trafficking shelter, adopting a law to provide residency to 20,000 vulnerable stateless persons, and continuing prevention activities against the use of child labor in the cotton harvest. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. Endemic corruption contributed to the transport of victims across borders, yet the government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government officials complicit in human trafficking offenses. Courts issued weak sentences for some traffickers, the government did not provide victims with any form of witness protection, and gaps remained in the implementation of the victim protection law.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
- Adopt and implement standard operating procedures for identifying trafficking victims and referring them to care.
- Train law enforcement to screen for signs of trafficking among vulnerable groups, including adults in commercial sex and foreign migrant workers.
- Ensure victims are not penalized for crimes committed as a direct result of being subjected to trafficking.
- While respecting due process, vigorously investigate and prosecute suspected... traffickers, including officials complicit in trafficking. - Sentence traffickers to significant prison terms and ensure convicted traffickers serve those sentences in practice. - Continue to contribute funding and in-kind support to provide comprehensive care to victims. - Continue to monitor the prohibition of forced child labor in the cotton harvest and hold those in violation accountable. - Encourage victims’ assistance in the investigation and prosecution of traffickers either directly or via partnerships with NGOs. - Ensure the screening of children returned from Iraq and Syria for child soldiering indicators and provide identified victims with rehabilitation and reintegration support. - Improve the collection of anti-trafficking law enforcement data. - Continue to provide anti-trafficking training or guidance for diplomatic personnel and other government employees, including law enforcement officers, border guards, and customs officials, to prevent their engagement or facilitation of trafficking crimes. - Monitor private employment agencies for recruitment fees charged to workers and take steps to eliminate employee-paid fees.

PROSECUTION
The government maintained its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. Article 130.1 and Article 167 of the criminal code criminalized labor trafficking and sex trafficking and prescribed penalties of five to eight years’ imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent and, with regard to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Article 167 defined child trafficking broadly to include illegal adoption without the purpose of exploitation. The government investigated 18 cases involving 23 suspected traffickers in 2019, compared to 21 cases involving 38 suspected traffickers investigated in 2018. The government continued to pursue a 2017 investigation of four private employment agencies that facilitated the trafficking of Tajikistani victims in Saudi Arabia. An investigation of a suspected Tajikistani trafficker allegedly residing in Germany also remained ongoing. The government prosecuted 20 criminal cases in 2019 involving 35 defendants, compared with nine cases involving 18 suspects in 2018. The courts convicted four traffickers; two received sentences of eight years’ imprisonment and two were sentenced to five years’ imprisonment, though courts later reduced those sentences to two years’ probation for each individual. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government employees complicit in human trafficking offenses; however, corruption and official complicity in trafficking crimes remained significant concerns, inhibiting law enforcement action during the year. Endemic corruption facilitated transport of victims across borders and through inspection points. Women in commercial sex, some of whom may have been unidentified trafficking victims, reported instances of sexual violence by law enforcement officials. The Ministry of Internal Affairs (MIA) continued to conduct training on human trafficking for new staff as part of its training academy curriculum. In partnership with NGOs, the government trained border guards, investigators, prosecutors, and judges on the 2014 victim protection law, victim-centered approaches, investigative techniques, and the national referral mechanism.

PROTECTION
The government increased protection efforts. The government identified 53 trafficking victims in 2019, the same number as reported in 2018. The government did not provide additional information, such as the victims’ nationality, gender, or type or location of exploitation. An international organization reported assisting 24 victims of transnational trafficking, 19 of whom were referred by Tajikistani law enforcement (an increase from 11 in 2018), four by NGOs, and one by a foreign embassy; 21 were Tajikistani citizens and three were Vietnamese. Of the 24 victims assisted, 13 were adult males, 11 were victims of forced labor, and 13 were victims of sex trafficking. The government continued to implement the 2014 victim protection law, which set forth the provision of victim services; formalized the roles of agencies tasked with providing services; established government standards for service delivery among providers, including governmental agencies and NGOs; and mandated a national referral mechanism. However, gaps remained in the implementation of the victim protection law; some victims not referred to the government or an international organization lacked adequate access to attorneys during the investigation process and criminal proceedings. Tajikistani law enforcement agencies have not developed procedures to provide a legal status to victims, and some victims had to pay for legal and medical services that otherwise should have been provided by the government.

Most notably, authorities remained without a formal system for identifying trafficking victims and referring them to services. The government did not provide an update on whether the draft guidelines for victim identification, developed by a legislative reform working group and submitted to the government for approval in 2018, were adopted. Due to a lack of formal identification procedures, authorities may have penalized some unidentified victims for unlawful acts traffickers forced them to commit. Law enforcement officials routinely deported foreign migrant workers and did not attempt to identify trafficking victims proactively among men and women in commercial sex or forced labor. Officials also sometimes temporarily detained sex trafficking victims with their traffickers but later released and referred victims for assistance.

The government continued to operate the country’s sole trafficking shelter. The government contracted an NGO to provide victim services and provided 242,000 somoni ($25,080) for the shelter’s operating costs, medical assistance for victims, legal consultations, and partial funding of staff salaries, an increase compared with 190,000 somoni ($19,690) in 2018. The shelter assisted 20 victims in 2019, compared with six in 2018. Article 30 of the trafficking law mandated the creation of governmental and private institutions to directly aid victims with food and shelter, as well as social, legal, and reintegration assistance; however, outside of the funding for the shelter, an international organization funded most victim protection services.

Despite provisions in the 2014 law for security measures for trafficking victims, the government did not keep victims’ personal information confidential or provide protection for victim witnesses or their advocates. The law provided foreign victims the right to request temporary residency, which could be extended for one year following the completion of a criminal case based on the victims’ cooperation with law enforcement agencies, although no such cases were reported in 2019. There was no formal policy encouraging victims’ voluntary participation in legal proceedings; the 2014 victim protection law did not link other benefits to a victim’s participation in a trial and provided services regardless of legal status or prior consent to participate in subsequently identified trafficking crimes.

PREVENTION
The government maintained efforts to prevent human trafficking. The 2014 law established a framework for the government to address human trafficking and a national anti-trafficking commission tasked with coordinating the government’s anti-trafficking efforts and developing a national plan. In December 2019, the anti-trafficking commission, in partnership with an international organization, held a national stakeholder dialogue in Dushanbe. In March 2019, the president signed the National Action Plan (NAP) for Counteracting Trafficking in Persons for 2019-2021. Civil society organizations, in coordination with trafficking victims, contributed to the NAP, and the government tasked state ministries to provide implementation updates every six months. The government operated a 24-hour hotline for potential victims; the government reported identifying 19 cases from calls in 2019 and referring the victims to an international organization, compared with 11 in 2018. In 2019, the Committee on Women and Family Affairs and the Committee for Youth Affairs and Sports continued to conduct awareness campaigns, including disseminating booklets and holding discussions on combating and preventing trafficking, especially among youth. The government continued to conduct anti-trafficking courses for officials, school administrators, and law students.

The Ministry of Education continued to disseminate letters to local governments highlighting prohibitions against the use of child labor in the cotton harvest. Government-funded campaigns targeted potential victims, local officials responsible for preventing trafficking, and school authorities who had previously mobilized children in the cotton harvest. The government assigned an unspecified number of inspectors to conduct monitoring for child labor in the cotton harvest, continuing a practice begun in 2010, originally in cooperation with NGOs. NGOs continued to independently monitor the fields on an informal basis for forced labor concerns. The Ministry of Labor invited the ILO to conduct independent inspections during the 2019 cotton harvest season, but due to the lack of funding, ILO did not conduct these inspections.

Tajikistani law required entities engaged in recruitment of workers for employment abroad to obtain licenses from migration authorities and provided punitive measures for violations; however, Tajikistan is not a member of the ILO Convention on Private Employment Agencies and did not monitor for illegal recruitment fees. The government reported four ongoing investigations against labor recruitment firms suspected of trafficking. The Ministry of Labor operated four pre-departure counseling centers in different regions of the country that provided migrants with information on the risk of trafficking prior to travel abroad. The government followed a road map for reintegrating returning migrants banned from re-entering Russia and sought to assist migrant workers diversify geographical options for work abroad. The stateless population in Tajikistan, mostly consisting of former Soviet citizens, was at risk for trafficking. In December 2019, parliament adopted a draft law providing amnesty to 20,000 stateless persons and enabling them to obtain a five-year residence permit and benefit from the same rights as Tajikistani citizens. The government did not report anti-trafficking training for its diplomatic personnel. The government made no efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, traffickers exploit victims from Tajikistan abroad, and to a lesser extent, traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Tajikistan. Extensive economic migration exposes Tajikistani men, women, and children to the risk of human trafficking. Labor traffickers exploit Tajikistani men and women in agriculture and construction in Russia, United Arab Emirates (UAE), Kazakhstan, Saudi Arabia, and to a lesser extent, in other neighboring Central Asian countries, Turkey, and Afghanistan. Labor traffickers exploit men in agriculture, construction, and at markets in Tajikistan; there are limited reports of domestic sex trafficking of men. Sex traffickers exploit women and children from Tajikistan primarily in Turkey, UAE, Russia, and also in Saudi Arabia, Kazakhstan, and Afghanistan, as well as within Tajikistan.

Traffickers increasingly target women and minors. In some cases, migrant workers abandon their families, increasing the trafficking risk for women as sole providers for their families. The Russian re-entry ban has changed the nature of labor migration in Tajikistan. As of February 2019, 240,000 Tajikistani migrants remained banned, and although government data indicate a decline in the departure of prospective male labor migrants, Tajikistani women are departing in search of work at an increased rate. From 2015 to 2016, there was a 27 percent increase observed among women. Other migrants prefer to stay in irregular status in Russia and face greater risks of exploitation and deportation rather than risk being banned after visiting family in Tajikistan. International organizations estimate the number of Tajikistani citizens living and working in Russia is approaching one million. Some women who traveled to Syria or Iraq with promises of marriage were instead sold into sexual slavery. Children of Tajikistani ISIS combatants in Iraq and Syria were at risk for child soldiering. Traffickers transport Tajikistani women and girls to Afghanistan for the purpose of forced marriage, which can lead to sex trafficking and forced labor in domestic service and forms of debt-based coercion. Traffickers exploited Tajikistani children in sex trafficking and forced labor, including forced begging, in Tajikistan and Afghanistan. Tajikistani children and adults may be subjected to forced labor in agriculture, mainly during Tajikistan’s fall cotton harvest—and in dried fruit production. The government may have subjected some citizens to participate in manual labor, such as cleaning roads and park maintenance. Some Afghan and Bangladeshi citizens are victims of forced labor in Tajikistan, including in the construction industry. In some cases, sex traffickers exploit LGBTI persons.
PRIORITY RECOMMENDATIONS:
Fully implement the protection provisions of the 2008 anti-trafficking act, as outlined in the implementing regulations and the national action plan, including allocating resources to the victim assistance fund. • Continue to develop and implement standard operating procedures (SOPs) for victim identification and referral to services and train officials on SOPs, especially to identify vulnerable populations including impoverished and orphaned children, Tanzanians migrating for work abroad, and Burundian refugees. • Amend the 2008 anti-trafficking act to remove sentencing provisions that allow fines in lieu of imprisonment and align the procedural law pertaining to trafficking-related arrests within the act with the requirements for other serious crimes. • While respecting the rule of law and human rights, increase efforts to investigate, prosecute, and convict trafficking offenders, including complicit officials, and impose adequate penalties. • Institutionalize the use of the national centralized anti-trafficking data collection and reporting tool and consider increasing information sharing. • Increase funding for the anti-trafficking committee and ATS to implement the national action plan to combat trafficking. • Implement strong regulations and oversight of recruitment companies that are consistently enforced, including prosecuting for fraudulent labor recruitment. • Increase migrant worker protections by eliminating recruitment fees charged to migrant workers, increasing employer security deposits, minimum salaries and pre-departure training for migrant workers, and establishing a mutually enforceable standard contract, a complaints mechanism for returning workers, a public blacklist of abusive employers, and requiring exit interviews and embassy approval of residency permits of migrant workers. • Increase public awareness campaigns to families, schools, and community leaders. • Implement a systematic victim-witness support program.

PROSECUTION
The government maintained mixed anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. The 2008 Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed punishments of two to 10 years’ imprisonment, a fine between five million and 100 million Tanzania shillings (TZS) ($2,180 to $43,610), or both for offenses involving adult victims, and 10 to 20 years’ imprisonment, a fine between five million and 150 million TZS ($2,180 to $65,420), or both for those involving child victims. These penalties were sufficient but, with regard to sex trafficking, by allowing a fine in lieu of imprisonment, the penalties were not commensurate with those for other serious crimes, such as rape. The ATS drafted an amendment to the 2008 anti-trafficking law; parliament had not yet reviewed the amendment by the end of the reporting period. The 2008 anti-trafficking act contained a separate procedural provision that required police to obtain a warrant before making a trafficking-related arrest; this provision created a higher threshold for law enforcement that does not exist for other similarly serious crimes, which may hinder prosecution efforts.

The government did not maintain comprehensive law enforcement statistics on trafficking. The government investigated 19 trafficking cases during the reporting period, compared with zero investigations during the previous reporting period. The government prosecuted at least 13 defendants and convicted at least five traffickers under the 2008 anti-trafficking act for sex trafficking; this is compared with 24 prosecutions and three convictions in the previous period. The government sentenced one sex trafficker to three years’ imprisonment for exploiting two girls in the Singida region and sentenced two other traffickers to two years’ imprisonment each; the government did not report the sentencing of the remaining two traffickers. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of officials complicit in trafficking offenses; however, corruption within the judicial system and official complicity in crimes remained significant concerns and inhibited law enforcement action during the year.

Previously, the government worked with an international organization to develop and implement a data collection and reporting system, which uploaded and integrated national and regional information on trafficking cases and victim and trafficker profiles. The government reported utilizing aspects of the system during the reporting period; however, the government reported that due to outdated technology, disparate capacities amongst government ministries and entities, and the lack of training on the system, usage of the data system was erratic and minimal. The government continued to provide support for human trafficking modules in ATS training curricula, which invited law enforcement and other stakeholders, but the government did not report how many new police recruits received this training during the reporting period. The government reported incorporating information on how traffickers target vulnerable victims and effective use of victim referral manuals into the standard law enforcement training curricula during the reporting period. In collaboration with an international organization and with foreign donor support, the government trained 181 police officers, immigration officials, prosecutors, social welfare professionals, community leaders, and NGOs on human trafficking, including victim identification, and separately supported and facilitated workshops for 70 police, immigration officials, prosecutors, social welfare, community leaders, and NGOs. In partnership with foreign donors, the government also facilitated and supported six trainings for 218 government officials over the course of the reporting period.

PROTECTION
The government increased protection efforts. The government reported identifying 161 potential trafficking victims, a significant increase compared with 13 victims during the previous reporting period. The implementing regulations of the 2008 anti-trafficking act required police and immigration authorities to use standardized procedures and forms for case investigation and victim identification and referral. The government drafted standardized forms for identification and referral in a previous reporting period; however, the procedures were not fully implemented because the government did not fund their dissemination. The government reported referring all of the potential victims to assistance during this reporting period. Of the 170 government identified victims, 159 were female, two were male, one was an adult, and nine remained unknown. Additionally, NGOs reported assisting at least 87 identified victims during the reporting period. The 2008 anti-trafficking act mandated the government provide victims with psycho-social counseling, family tracing, family reunification, and temporary shelter. The government reported providing case management and services to victims it referred during the reporting period. The government reported coordinating information sharing between the ATS and the Department of Social Welfare. The government continued to rely on government-vetted NGOs to provide the vast majority of victim assistance. The government did not operate any domestic trafficking shelters; however, the government vetted and approved a new organization and its shelter, bringing the number of government accredited organizations to five, thence, eight government-vetted and accredited shelters. The government maintained referral agreements with vetted NGOs that manage shelters. The government, in collaboration with an international organization, created a national guideline for shelters on how to effectively operate safe shelters. NGO-run shelters provided medical care, psycho-social counseling, and family tracing for victims. The government continued to place children in specialized shelters, where they were enrolled in government schools or given vocational training and had separate accommodations for boys and girls. Although NGOs continued to report female adult trafficking victims could seek assistance at a shelter dedicated to young girls, there were no shelters available for adult male trafficking victims. Foreign victims were allowed the same access to assistance, counseling, medical care, and training as domestic victims; however, an international organization reported some NGO-run shelters do not accept foreign victims. Civil society, NGOs, and government officials reported close collaboration amongst one another in efforts to identify and refer victims to care and assistance.

The government assisted in the repatriation of seven Tanzanian victims and three foreign victims; two of the foreign victims were repatriated to Mozambique and one to South Africa, compared with eight total repatriations in the previous reporting period. The government identified and referred to care and assistance ten Tanzanian additional trafficking victims abroad including one in Uganda, two in Thailand, two in Iraq, and five in Kenya. The anti-trafficking law provides foreign victims legal alternatives to their removal to countries where their safety or that of their families may be endangered; however, during the reporting period, the government did not grant residency or temporary stay to any trafficking victims. The government reported it was able to provide assistance to foreign victims, by facilitating travel documents, providing secure passage to a border, and resettling victims to a third country when their return to countries where their safety or that of their families may be endangered.

The government did not report penalizing victims for unlawful acts traffickers forced them to commit; however, due to a lack of formal identification procedures, authorities reportedly deported or detained some unidentified trafficking victims. Observers reported 1,324 Ethiopians, who they believed to show indicators of trafficking, had been arrested and remained in detention for immigration violations; the government did not investigate or screen these cases for trafficking. The government signed an agreement with the Government of Ethiopia to commute the sentences of the detained Ethiopians in order for an international organization to repatriate them with foreign donor funding. The sentences were commuted and the Ethiopians were removed in 14 groups over the course of February and March 2020 through an airline’s assistance. The government also reported that children and adults are frequently incarcerated in the same detention centers, increasing children’s risk for further exploitation and abuse; ATS continued to advocate for changing this policy. The government took proactive measures to restructure ATS to increase the number of staff and its budget allocation. By the end of the reporting period, the government had not allocated funding for the anti-trafficking fund for victim assistance.

Victims typically testify in trafficking cases, but the Whistle Blowers and Witness Protection Act of 2015 and the 2008 anti-trafficking act gave any victim of a crime, including trafficking victims, the option to refuse to participate in prosecution efforts. The government took steps to implement a witness protection program, but by the end of the reporting period, it did not fully implement it, deterring some victims from testifying in court. Victims could testify during trial in private sessions or via video testimony; however, the government did not report victims using private sessions during trial or video testimony to protect trafficking victims’ confidentiality and privacy during the reporting period. The anti-trafficking law entitled victims to restitution from convicted traffickers; however, the government did not report awarding restitution during the reporting period.

PREVENTION

The government minimally maintained efforts to prevent trafficking. The government allocated a budget of 100.5 million Tzs ($43,830) to the ATS, the working level anti-trafficking body, a similar amount as the year prior in 2019. The anti-trafficking committee, the governmental entity responsible for the oversight and direction of ATS, had a mandate to meet quarterly but only met once during the reporting period due to a lack of funds. The government implemented some aspects of its 2018-2021 national action plan. ATS partnered with an NGO to organize and facilitate a training for teachers, community development officers, police officers from gender desks, social welfare officers, and representatives from local government. ATS offered in-kind support to an NGO on a collaborated awareness-raising program in the eastern region in November 2019. The government co-organized and offered support and resources for a public awareness event in which over 500 members of the government and public attended; the event was also broadcast on national television. The government continued to fund and publicize a national hotline operated by a local NGO to report child abuse, including child trafficking. The government reported victims identified from the hotline received assistance, although it was not able to provide disaggregated data on the number of trafficking victims it referred.

Government agencies in mainland Tanzania and Zanzibar performed periodic inspections of large employers in an effort to detect cases of forced labor, but they did not report identifying any forced labor cases. During the previous reporting period, the Ministry of Labor, Employment, and Youth Development suspended the registrations of all labor recruitment agencies and required them to reapply to ensure proper vetting. During the reporting period, the government provided 30 business licenses to labor recruiting agencies, which are usually one-year operating licenses. During the reporting period, the government did not report pursuing any investigations or prosecutions for fraudulent labor recruitment.

The government continued to recognize that additional bilateral labor agreements with destination countries, a comprehensive labor migration law, pre-departure and vocational skills training, and funding for labor attachés at diplomatic missions abroad were critical protections needed to protect Tanzanian migrant workers who remained vulnerable to trafficking; however, the government did not report efforts to implement these migrant worker protections. The government reportedly had a bilateral labor agreement in place with Qatar but did not report implementing the agreement or signing any new agreements with other destination countries. The government continued to require Tanzanians to have valid passports and labor contracts with salary, leave, and health care provisions in order to obtain the necessary training certificate, a letter of permission, and an exit permit to migrate for work. The government continued to suspend the issuance of travel documents to departing Tanzanian migrant workers who could not provide a relevant training certificate for the overseas job; while positively intentioned, this step may have increased their vulnerability to trafficking when some subsequently chose to migrate through unregulated ways. The Companies Act of 2002 required recruitment agencies to be registered and licensed and the government required recruitment agencies to provide migrant workers with training on worker rights and destination countries’ laws prior to departure. Tanzanian embassies abroad continued to require employers to submit security deposits to the embassy to ensure that the employer would present the migrant worker upon arrival, so the embassy could verify that the worker arrived and possessed the proper documentation, including contract and passport. However, the government continued to report that, in practice, recruitment agencies were not providing pre-departure training to migrant workers, and an NGO previously argued the deposit amount was too small and an insufficient incentive for employers to present migrant workers upon arrival to the Tanzanian embassy. Observers continued to report ongoing challenges faced by migrant workers, including that Tanzanian contracts were often different from the destination country contract and usually not enforceable, sometimes migrant workers paid recruitment fees, there was no “blacklist” available for migrant workers to avoid previously abusive employers, and recruitment agencies operating in Tanzania would sometimes use “sub-agents,” thereby skirting the registration requirements. The government continued to lack a complaint mechanism for returning migrant workers. While the government continued to provide anti-trafficking training to its diplomatic personnel, the staff at foreign embassies were not always trained to identify and assist trafficking victims. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Tanzania, and traffickers exploit victims from Tanzania abroad. Traffickers often dupe family members, friends, or intermediaries into aiding traffickers’ in their exploitative tactics by offering assistance with education and better living conditions or securing employment in urban areas and abroad. The government reported that brokers sometimes enter into communities to recruit and transport victims into trafficking situations. Impoverished and orphaned children from the rural interior remain most at risk to trafficking. Traffickers exploit girls in domestic servitude throughout the country and in sex trafficking, particularly in tourist hubs and along the border with Kenya. An NGO stated that traffickers target young girls from rural and impoverished villages, pay their parents a small fee, and coerce the girls in sex trafficking to business people who believe a myth that having intercourse with a “virgin” will allow their business to prosper. Traffickers subject children to forced labor on farms—including as cattle herders and occasionally as hunters—and in gold and gemstone mines and quarries, the informal commercial sector, and on fishing vessels operating on the high seas. Some unscrupulous individuals manipulate the traditional practice of child fostering—in which poor parents entrust their children into the care of wealthier relatives or respected community members—who subject children to forced labor as domestic workers.

Tanzanian fishermen work on fishing vessels with indicators of trafficking. In 2017, an NGO reported 14 Indonesian trafficking victims were identified aboard a Malaysian-flagged fishing vessel, and in 2018, another NGO reported that 12 Tanzanian trafficking victims were identified aboard a Chinese-flagged fishing vessel, both in Tanzanian territorial waters. Previous media reports indicate that traffickers transported Tanzanian children with physical disabilities to Kenya and forced them to work as beggars or in massage parlors. In 2018, the Kenyan government identified 29 female Tanzanian potential victims in Kenya; the girls were to be taken to the United Arab Emirates (UAE) and to pay for their transportation fees with a kidney.

Traffickers sometimes subject Tanzanians to forced labor, including in domestic service, and sex trafficking in other African countries, the Middle East, Europe, Asia, and the United States. Observers reported traffickers and their victims increasingly transited Zanzibar en route for forced labor in domestic service in Oman and the UAE. In 2019, there were reports of Burundians identified as meeting indicators of trafficking en route to the UAE and Kenya, whom Tanzanian immigration officers deported to Burundi. Citizens of neighboring countries may transit Tanzania before traffickers subject them to domestic servitude or sex trafficking in Kenya, South Africa, Europe, and the Middle East. Children from Burundi and Rwanda are increasingly subjected to child forced labor in Tanzania. Trafficking victims subjected to forced labor in Tabora were reportedly from rural areas of Kigoma—the location of refugee camps and settlements. During 2019, North Koreans working in Tanzania may have been forced to work by the North Korean government.

The Government of Thailand does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Thailand remained on Tier 2. These efforts included providing anti-trafficking training to judges and working with NGOs to provide trauma-informed care training to police, prosecutors, and shelter staff. The government investigated more suspected cases of labor trafficking compared to the previous reporting period, sentenced convicted traffickers to significant terms of imprisonment, increased the amount of compensation provided to victims through the anti-trafficking fund, and successfully provided restitution to victims of trafficking for the first time during the reporting period. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. Officials continued to conflate trafficking and smuggling during the reporting period, effective victim identification remained inadequate, and the government did not provide adequate psycho-social care to victims or provide victims residing in government shelters sufficient freedom of movement. The government initiated the fewest number of trafficking investigations since 2014, convicted the fewest number of traffickers since 2015, and only initiated investigations of two complicit officials. The government amended the 2008 anti-trafficking law to include a separate “forced labor or services” provision which prescribed significantly lower penalties for labor trafficking offenses than those already available under the existing trafficking provision of the law.

THAILAND: TIER 2

Prioritized Recommendations:
- Improve the capacity of law enforcement to proactively prosecute and convict labor traffickers and identify labor trafficking victims.
- Proactively investigate and prosecute officials allegedly complicit in facilitating trafficking, and convict and punish those found guilty with adequate prison sentences.
- Ensure government and NGO-operated shelters provide victims with adequate trauma-informed care, such as legal assistance and psychological care, including by increasing the number of full-time interpreters and psychologists employed in shelters.
- Increase the ability of victims, especially adults, to move freely in and out of shelters and access communication devices, and reassess shelter placements periodically to ensure victims are not required to remain in shelters longer than necessary.
- Improve training provided to labor, provincial and local police, immigration, and social welfare officials to increase proactive victim identification among vulnerable populations, including adults and children in commercial sex, children engaged in begging and street vending, migrants working in agriculture, manufacturing, fishing, seafood processing, construction, and domestic service industries, and among North Korean workers.
- Extend the period in which officials are required to formally identify a potential victim in order to allow victims time to obtain government services, recover from their exploitation, and recount their experiences to authorities.
- Do not make victims’ formal identification and access to services dependent on their willingness to participate in investigations against their traffickers.
- Ensure victims of trafficking identified under the definitions set forth in Sections 6 and 6/1 of the trafficking law, as amended, are afforded the same rights and access to services. • Increase efforts to ensure employers provide workers contracts in a language they understand. • Continue to support the development of victim-centric and trauma-informed approaches among judges overseeing trafficking cases. • Increase collaboration with local civil society organizations in migrant worker assistance centers, post-arrival centers, and government shelters, including in the provision of services to victims. • Continue to increase efforts to ensure victims receive court-order restitution from their traffickers. • Foster an environment conducive to victims and advocates reporting human trafficking crimes without fear of facing spurious retributive charges pursued by employers, including by utilizing new amendments to dismiss cases filed with dishonest intent or to intimidate defendants. • Provide technical and financial support for NGO-operated shelters to enable more to assist victims. • Increase government coordination to ensure labor violations and migrant workers’ complaints that include indicators of forced labor are investigated for trafficking crimes. • Enforce regular payment of wages, requirements that employers pay recruitment fees of migrant workers, and the rights of employees to retain possession of their own identity and financial documents.

PROSECUTION
The government maintained law enforcement efforts. Section 6 of the 2008 anti-trafficking law, as amended, criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of four to 12 years’ imprisonment and a fine of 400,000 to 1.2 million baht ($13,440 to $40,310) for offenses involving an adult victim, and six to 20 years’ imprisonment and a fine of 600,000 to two million baht ($20,150 to $67,180) for those involving a child victim. These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. In April 2019, the government amended the 2008 anti-trafficking law to include a separate provision under Section 6/1, specifically addressing “forced labor or services,” which prescribed penalties of six months’ to four years’ imprisonment, a fine of 50,000 to 400,000 baht ($1,680 to $13,440) per victim, or both. This new provision prescribed significantly lower penalties for labor trafficking offenses than those already available under the existing human trafficking provision of the law. In 2019, the government reported investigating 288 potential trafficking cases (304 in 2018), initiating prosecutions of 386 suspected traffickers (438 in 2018), and convicting 304 traffickers (316 in 2018). The government reported investigating 76 potential cases of labor trafficking—including four cases involving the fishing sector—compared to 43 in 2018. Courts sentenced approximately 74 percent of convicted traffickers to five or more years of imprisonment. During the reporting period, law enforcement increasingly conflated trafficking and smuggling crimes, and local observers reported that pressure from Royal Thai Police (RTP) leadership to provincial police to increase the number of trafficking cases resulted in police, sometimes knowingly, identifying cases of migrant smuggling as trafficking. The trafficking litigation unit of the Office of the Attorney General (OAG) did not find sufficient evidence of trafficking in approximately 18 percent of cases with arrested suspects referred to the unit by law enforcement in 2019, which was an increase compared to nine percent in 2018 and two percent in 2017. The absence of legislation criminalizing human smuggling crimes may have increased the likelihood that officials identified smuggling cases as trafficking.

The government operated specialized anti-trafficking divisions within the Bangkok Criminal Court, the OAG, Department of Special Investigation (DSI), and the RTP. The Thailand Anti-Trafficking in Persons Task Force (TATIP) specialized in investigating complex cases and comprised law enforcement, social workers, and NGOs. Local observers reported the anti-trafficking division of RTP sometimes referred trafficking cases to inexperienced local agencies or did not properly manage the oversight of cases investigated by suspected complicit local police. The Thai Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force (TICAC) investigated 36 cases of internet-facilitated child sex trafficking (19 in 2018). In 2019 courts issued forfeiture orders for assets valued at 401,014 baht ($13,470) which had been subjected to restraint and seizure orders in 15 trafficking cases litigated by the anti-money laundering office (AMLO). Thai authorities continued to hold bilateral meetings with neighboring countries to facilitate information-sharing and evidence-gathering in trafficking cases. In addition, law enforcement officials cooperated with foreign counterparts to investigate the trafficking of Thai victims abroad. While interagency coordination was effective in major cities, in some provinces observers reported ineffective communication among agencies and civil society. In January 2020, the police anti-trafficking division held a meeting with local NGOs to discuss collaboration on trafficking cases, with a focus on cases involving forced labor. In addition, the Courts of Justice organized a roundtable meeting with police, prosecutors, and NGOs to discuss laws and procedures relevant to trafficking cases.

Some victims continued to report reluctance to participate in prosecutions due to fear of detention and extended shelter stays, fears of experiencing retaliation from traffickers, and language barriers. In an attempt to increase victims’ willingness to participate as witnesses, Thai courts admitted advance and video testimony as evidence in trials; courts conducted 15 advanced hearings for 41 witnesses in 2019. Thai authorities also worked with authorities in neighboring countries to enable testimony from witnesses outside of Thailand, although some local NGOs reported an unwillingness among local police and prosecutors to do so. Prosecutors worked with NGOs to prepare victims to testify, and courts allowed NGO lawyers to serve as co-plaintiffs in some cases to legally support victims. The government provided approximately 2.44 million baht ($82,000) for witness protection services for 193 witnesses in trafficking cases in 2019, compared to 2.45 million baht ($82,290) for 15 witnesses in 2018. The OAG partnered with an NGO to organize trainings for prosecutors on trauma-informed procedures in trafficking cases and organized trainings on forced labor for police and prosecutors in southern and central Thailand. The government partnered with an NGO to organize seminars for police, prosecutors, and social service providers to promote increased coordination in child sex trafficking cases, and RTP organized trainings for police on internet-facilitated sex trafficking. The office of the judiciary collaborated with UNODC and a university to provide training to criminal, civil, and labor court judges on trafficking laws and best practices for overseeing trafficking cases. In addition, the Courts of Justice collaborated with a foreign government to organize a seminar for 30 judges on trafficking. MSHDS provided training to 200 police officers on the Beggar Control Act and identification of forced begging cases. However, first responders, prosecutors, and judges sometimes did not properly interpret or apply trafficking laws, especially for labor trafficking. Prosecutors and multi-disciplinary teams (MDTs) frequently looked for evidence of physical abuse, and cases of labor trafficking were frequently directed to labor courts rather than criminal prosecution. The frequent rotation of police officers also meant officers with experience working trafficking cases were rotated out of their positions, and often replaced with inexperienced officers. For the first time, a Thai court permitted a judgement against a convicted trafficking network from a foreign court as evidence in a related prosecution, which resulted in a successful conviction.

Corruption and official complicity facilitated trafficking and continued to impede anti-trafficking efforts. Some NGOs' perceptions of corruption made them reluctant to work with the government or certain agencies in some cases. Observers continued to report a reluctance by some law enforcement officials to investigate influential boat owners and captains, including those whom they perceived to have connections with politicians. Further, some police may have purposely compromised investigations and failed to provide prosecutors sufficient evidence to prosecute trafficking cases. The government reported two new investigations of official complicity in 2019. The Public Sector Anti-Corruption Commission and Department of Special Investigations (DSI) referred four officials to prosecutors. In 2019, the government reported convicting 14 officials complicit in trafficking crimes (16 in 2018), sentencing six to terms of imprisonment ranging from 34 to 225 years’ imprisonment; sentencing for eight officials convicted for soliciting child sex trafficking victims was pending at the end of the reporting period. In addition, courts increased the terms of imprisonment of previously convicted officials complicit in the trafficking of Rohingya migrants. The government utilized administrative punishments against some suspected complicit officials rather than criminally investigating and prosecuting them. The government did not report investigating or prosecuting immigration officials who facilitated trafficking by accepting bribes at border checkpoints.

PROTECTION

The government demonstrated uneven progress to identify and protect victims. The government identified 868 victims of sex and labor trafficking in 2019, compared to approximately 631 victims identified in 2018. However, the government also reported identifying an additional 950 individuals as trafficking victims subjected to “extortion,” many of whom were likely irregular Burmese or Rohingya migrants transiting Thailand seeking employment in third countries, particularly Malaysia. This apparent conflation of trafficking with smuggling crimes resulted in overcrowding at government-operated trafficking shelters and may have decreased the quality of services provided to sex and labor trafficking victims. Of the 868 sex and labor trafficking victims identified by Thai officials, 258—who were mostly Thai—chose not to reside in government shelters, and 28 victims resided in NGO government-registered shelters. The 610 sex and labor trafficking victims whom the Ministry of Social Development and Human Security (MSDHS) reported assisting in government and NGO shelters (401 in 2018), included 134 Thai and 476 foreign victims, and 170 victims of sex trafficking and 440 victims of labor trafficking. Immigration authorities did not identify any victims among the 7,156 migrants screened in immigration detention centers, compared to 15 identified in 2018; NGOs reported authorities decreased efforts to provide temporary assistance to victims, including to sex and labor trafficking victims among this population during the reporting period.

MDTs, which comprised government agencies and NGOs, utilized standard screening guidelines to formally identify victims and refer them to services. The government collaborated with an international organization to provide a training for 30 trainers from Bangkok and high-risk provinces on labor trafficking victim identification and protection. In addition, MOL organized numerous trainings for labor officers and inspectors on identifying trafficking. MSDHS trained 1,000 MDT participants on victim identification, with a focus on forced labor following the 2019 amendment to the anti-trafficking law. Government agencies worked with NGOs to revise the preliminary victim identification form to include victims of forced labor, as defined under Section 6/1 of the amended anti-trafficking law; the government approved the revised form in January 2020 and assigned MSDHS to develop additional guidelines for MDT victim interviews and organize trainings on the new form. Nonetheless, the absence of clear guidance on the application of the forced labor amendment in victim identification during the majority of the reporting period led to confusion among frontline officers. Although the government reported victims of forced labor under Section 6/1 were afforded the same rights to services as all other victims of trafficking, civil society groups reported that proposed implementing regulations, including those that provide permission for trafficking victims to remain in Thailand and allow victims to obtain compensation from the anti-trafficking fund, may not apply to those identified as victims of forced labor. Effective implementation of identification procedures by MDTs continued to be inconsistent. Observers reported some officials utilized practices during MDT victim interviews that hindered the ability of victims to recount their exploitation. For example, they reported officials allowing employers of potential victims to be present during victim interviews, some MDT interviews involved an excessive number of officials, and insufficient coordination between officials during interviews. One local NGO reported DSI officers more frequently utilized victim-centered practices during MDT interviews than local police officers. MDTs were also sometimes reluctant to make identifications unless a case was likely to result in a successful prosecution.

Labor inspectors and members of the Royal Thai Navy screened migrant workers for trafficking during inspections, and were required to refer all potential trafficking victims to MDTs for formal identification and service referral. Some officials failed to recognize trafficking cases that did not involve physical force or overt signs of coercion, such as delayed or non-payment of wages, debt-based coercion, and document confiscation. In addition, some officials did not routinely identify victims who initially consented to travel to Thailand or consented to work in the industry in which they were later exploited. Officials sometimes encouraged exploited workers who were likely victims of forced labor to mediate their situation with their employer or referred their cases to labor courts, rather than recognizing them as trafficking victims. Anecdotal reports suggested some government officials were reluctant to receive complaints or to identify victims due to fears it would indicate law enforcement incompetence or a failure of the government’s efforts to combat trafficking. Labor inspectors could be held personally liable for claims of abuse of power under Thai law, which may have discouraged them from reporting suspected exploitation.

The government could only provide temporary assistance to potential victims for up to eight days, and formal identification by MDTs was necessary for victims to obtain a legal right to services. This acted as a significant barrier for some victims who were not physically or psychologically prepared to undergo the MDT identification process to obtain services. Further, the absence of a suitable reflection period during which victims could access stabilizing services from the government, did not allow officials sufficient time to build rapport and trust with victims, including to obtain sufficient information to make a formal identification and to encourage victims’ participation in investigations. Consequently, victims frequently sought temporary care from NGOs, who did not receive government funding, before they were prepared to undergo the MDT interview process. The government continued to refer victims formally identified by MDTs to government-operated shelters where they had access to counseling, legal assistance, medical care, civil compensation, financial aid, witness protection, education or vocational trainings, and employment opportunities. However, authorities made the provision of services contingent upon a victim’s willingness to participate in law enforcement investigations. In addition, the government did not consistently provide repatriation assistance to victims who declined to participate in law enforcement investigations. MSDHS operated 76 short-stay shelters and nine long-term regional trafficking shelters, including four dedicated to adult male victims and families, four for female victims, and one for male child victims. The government continued to distribute a handbook in seven languages informing victims of their legal rights under the trafficking law, including access to services. The government only permitted foreign victims who held a valid visa or work permit at the time of their identification to stay outside government shelters during legal proceedings against their traffickers. Undocumented foreign victims of trafficking were required to remain in shelters while the government processed applications for permits to stay and work in Thailand. MSDHS trafficking shelters did not allow victims—including adults—to leave without permission, which was often denied; only victims who received permission to work outside shelters could leave the shelter on a regular basis for work. Further, victims were often required to stay in shelters until the completion of proceedings against their traffickers, even in cases in which they were physically and psychologically ready to exit the shelter system. In addition, shelter staff required victims to obtain permission to make personal phone calls and often monitored their calls. Requiring victims to remain in shelters longer than necessary, combined with the restrictions on their movement and communication during shelter stays, likely contributed to some victims’ re-traumatization and inhibited their ability to earn an income. The government did not report how many victims it permitted to work outside shelters in 2019—compared to 65 in 2018 and 149 in 2017. While the government made efforts to reduce the length of prosecutions and thereby decrease the amount of time victims had to stay in shelters, NGOs reported the required shelter stays continued to deter foreign victims from cooperating with law enforcement, with some preferring to instead be deported to their home countries. The government permitted some victims to reside at and obtain services at three government-registered NGO shelters; although victims obtaining these services could still obtain compensation from the government’s anti-trafficking fund, the government did not provide these shelters with additional funding to support their operations. In addition, observers reported strict requirements for NGO-operated shelters to receive permission to assist formally identified victims made it challenging for additional NGOs to obtain this registration. Due to the increase in victims and smuggled migrants authorities identified during the reporting period and the subsequent overcrowding within the nine trafficking shelters, the government placed 55 victims in two of the short-term government-operated shelters.

Government shelters often lacked adequate numbers of psychologists and staff trained on trauma-informed care, inhibiting victims from obtaining psycho-social and individualized care. In collaboration with an NGO, MSDHS organized training on trauma-informed care and trust-based relational interventions for shelter staff in both government and NGO-operated shelters. Contacts reported shelters did not always provide victims with private counseling and instead relied on group counseling sessions with social workers. MSDHS shelters did not provide specialized care to boys and LGBTI victims; in addition, authorities did not maintain guidelines for determining where to place transgender victims and required some to stay in shelters based on their sex assigned at birth. NGOs reported difficulty accessing victims they had supported once they entered MSDHS shelters; this, combined with insufficient communication from shelter staff, discouraged NGOs from further cooperating with the government or referring victims to authorities. MSDHS employed more than 300 interpreters, an increase compared to 251 in 2018, but often relied on interpreters provided by NGOs and international organizations during rescue operations. In addition, government shelters often lacked sufficient numbers of interpreters, which weakened their ability to provide adequate services to victims. MSDHS provided vocational training activities in shelters, and victims could earn a minor income from activities such as craft-making. However, observers continued to report inadequate options for vocational training and work offered in shelters. Thai law permitted foreign trafficking victims and witnesses to stay and work in Thailand for up to two years upon the completion of legal proceedings against their traffickers; however, the government did not report if any victims received this benefit during the reporting period.

Authorities facilitated the return of 123 Thais exploited abroad (103 in 2018), including 25 confirmed trafficking victims, by providing funding for travel expenses, legal assistance, job placement, and other reintegration services. MSDHS reported it assigned social workers to maintain contact with Thai victims for at least one year after their reintegration. The government worked with an NGO shelter in South Korea to provide assistance to Thai sex trafficking victims. Officials utilized approximately 2.17 million baht ($73,000) from the government’s anti-trafficking fund for aiding in the repatriation of foreign victims exploited in Thailand; the government did not report how many victims it repatriated in 2019, compared to 201 in 2018. In coordination with the Government of Cambodia, Thai agencies established standard operating procedures for repatriation and reintegration of victims between Cambodia and Thailand. However, Thai authorities did not consistently follow procedures for safely repatriating foreign victims.

The government opened two new child advocacy centers, which served as child-friendly spaces where law enforcement, NGOs, and social workers could conduct forensic interviews of child trafficking victims; this brought the total number of centers to seven. Local observers reported the government often deployed female officials to conduct identification interviews of female victims. Some judges lacked sufficient understanding of trauma-informed care, which resulted in harmful treatment of victims during court proceedings. While courts reportedly followed protocols to protect victims and witnesses in most instances, NGOs reported some incidents where the court failed to provide a non-confrontational cross examining area, despite advance request, and asked witnesses to verbally confirm sensitive information in front of the suspects during proceedings.

The 2016 Beggar Control Act provided for health and social services to individuals engaged in begging activities, including trafficking victims. The government reported identifying only seven victims of forced begging in 2019. NGOs reported the government lacked clear policies related to the protection of children compelled to sell items on the street and noted there was no agency responsible for protecting this population. MSDHS developed a mobile application for trafficking victims and witnesses to report exploitation and request protective services, including interpretation, and it provided information on the rights of trafficking victims in seven languages. MSDHS and MOL operated hotlines with operators fluent in 19 foreign languages. In 2019, the MSDHS trafficking hotline received calls related to 162 possible trafficking cases, including 19 involving forced labor (139 cases in 2018); officials referred 106 of these cases to related authorities but only referred 28 to the police anti-trafficking division. In 2019, MOL employed 91 language coordinators (84 in 2018) and 99 interpreters (69 in 2018), and the Department of Labour Protection and Welfare (DLPW) conducted training on labor laws and trafficking for 82 language coordinators.

In 2019, the government provided 11.88 million baht ($398,990) to trafficking victims from its anti-trafficking fund, including 1.68 million baht ($56,430) allocated to victims residing outside government shelters, an increase from 6.15 million baht ($206,580) in 2018. Thai law legally obligated prosecutors to file restitution claims when a victim expressed intention to make a claim. The Human Trafficking Criminal Procedures Act allowed judges to award compensation or restitution to victims, including in the absence of a victim request for these funds. The government did not report how many restitution claims prosecutors filed on behalf of victims in 2019 (116 in 2018) but reported courts ordered 3.3 million baht ($110,850) in restitution for 14 victims. in two cases in 2019. The government reported that for the first time, two victims successfully received court-ordered restitution from their traffickers; nonetheless, the execution of court orders to pay restitution for victims remained ineffective, particularly for non-Thai victims. MSDHS operated a unit under its anti-trafficking division to provide victims legal assistance and file compensation claims and utilized guidelines to enhance the efficacy of filing such claims. The government drafted an amendment to the Anti-Money Laundering Act of 1999 to expand the right of victims of trafficking to obtain compensation from assets forfeited from traffickers, which was pending the Thai Cabinet’s approval at the end of the reporting period.

The law protected victims from prosecution for unlawful acts their traffickers compelled them to commit; however, flaws in the government’s implementation of victim identification procedures increased the risk of authorities penalizing victims, including for prostitution and immigration violations. Employers reportedly convinced Thai law enforcement to bring criminal charges against exploited workers for theft when workers attempted to leave or change jobs. In addition, the government’s criminal defamation laws continued to allow companies to pursue criminal charges against potential victims and advocates during the reporting period, and the government did not report investigating company owners for subjecting these workers to exploitation. For example, in December 2019, courts convicted and sentenced a reporter to two years’ imprisonment for criminal libel for making comments on social media related to a poultry farm that was previously ordered to compensate 1.7 million baht ($57,100) to 14 Burmese workers who were subjected to conditions indicative of forced labor; since 2016, this company has pursued more than 36 complaints against rights advocates. Despite making amendments to the Criminal Procedure Code in March 2019 that would enable courts to immediately dismiss cases filed with dishonest intent or to intimidate the defendants, as well as amendments in February 2019 that strengthened the rights of defendants in cases where their employers filed criminal defamation charges, the government did not report utilizing these amendments to drop criminal defamation charges pursued against advocates during the reporting period. The government also amended the anti-trafficking law in 2015 to provide protection to whistleblowers but has never reported applying this provision.

PREVENTION

The government increased efforts to prevent trafficking. The prime minister oversaw the government’s anti-trafficking efforts through the Supervisory Policy Committee on Addressing Trafficking in Persons, and the government continued to monitor its progress to combat trafficking through data collection and annual reports to the prime minister and the Cabinet. In 2019, the government allocated approximately 3.8 billion baht ($127.9 million) towards its prevention and suppression of trafficking budget, compared to approximately 3.64 billion ($122.3 million) allocated in 2018. It conducted campaigns through newspapers, television, radio, social media, billboards, and handouts to raise public awareness throughout the country. Officials conducted numerous outreach activities to raise awareness of trafficking among school children, teachers, and community leaders. In addition, the foreign affairs ministry produced and shared a video clip on television and social media that included indicators of trafficking among Thai nationals abroad and methods to report suspected cases. In January and March 2020, MSDHS hosted a forum with NGOs, government agencies, international organizations, and the private sector to discuss anti-trafficking efforts and encourage increased collaboration; the government collected recommendations from participants at the January forum and presented them to the anti-trafficking committee in March. In June 2019, the government published the first nationally representative survey of children in the workplace, which was produced in collaboration with an international organization, and found approximately 177,000 children were involved in child labor, including 133,000 in hazardous working conditions.

Thai law permitted recruitment agencies to charge recruitment fees to Thais seeking overseas employment, and excessive fees incurred by some workers made them vulnerable to debt-based coercion. Through government-to-government formal migration channels, the government assisted 11,886 Thais to obtain employment abroad in 2019, including by providing job placement assistance. In addition, 14 provincial employment offices provided training, including on trafficking risks, to 4,803 Thai workers prior to their overseas employment. In November 2019, the Department of Employment (DOE) signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) with the South Korean Immigration Service that aimed to increase coordination to address the prevalence of undocumented Thai migrants working in South Korea and to prevent their exploitation in forced labor. In 2019, the government inspected 181 employment agencies that recruited Thai workers and found unlawful practices in four, resulting in license suspensions and revocations. It initiated prosecutions against 239 illegal brokers (416 in 2018) under the Employment and Job-Seeker Protection Act, reporting in the issuance of arrest warrants in seven cases. The government operated 12 labor offices in countries with large numbers of Thai workers; these offices conducted 887 inspections, assisted more than 5,980 workers, and trained 758 labor volunteers to assist in the identification of labor violations and trafficking among Thai workers.

In August 2019, the government approved the extension of stay for Cambodian, Laotian, and Burmese workers who obtained legal work permits through the nationality verification process, which allowed undocumented workers to obtain identity documents without leaving Thailand, by two years. Nonetheless, the complicated nature of government registration under the nationality verification process and in many cases, low levels of literacy, resulted in workers’ reliance on brokers and employers, who often overcharged workers to obtain documents, thereby increasing their vulnerability to debt-based coercion. The government also maintained bilateral MOUs with neighboring countries to recruit migrant workers to Thailand, and 413,536 workers were recruited through this system in 2019. However, high costs, difficulties in obtaining identity documents in home countries, and other administrative barriers continued to impede greater usage of this mechanism and also resulted in workers’ reliance on brokers assistance. The government also permitted migrants to obtain 30-day and 90-day border passes to work in non-seasonal agricultural or manufacturing jobs, including within 10 developing special economic zones, but such temporary working arrangements did not provide workers access to social protections. NGOs reported employers increasingly encouraged workers to obtain these border passes. The government reported labor inspectors conducted inspection of 146 establishments in border areas in 2019 and found 71 in violations of the law; however, the government did not report identifying any cases of trafficking through these efforts and only issued corrective orders in all but one case. In 2019, the government inspected 244 migrant worker recruitment agencies, compared to 67 in 2018, and found four operating in violation of the law.

Weaknesses in Thailand’s labor laws preventing migrant workers from forming labor unions may have contributed to exploitation. The 2018 Royal Ordinance on Management of Migrant Workers required employers to provide workers a copy of their employment contracts and to cover costs (excluding personal expenses such as passports, medical checks, and work permits) associated with bringing migrant workers to Thailand and back to their home countries when employment ends, such as recruitment fees and transportation
The government operated five post-arrival and reintegration centers that assisted migrant workers who entered Thailand through the MOU process by providing information on labor rights, Thai culture, employment contracts, trafficking awareness, and complaint mechanisms; in 2019, these centers assisted 413,536 migrant workers. However, due to the limited amount of time workers were present at these centers, which was usually immediately after workers’ arrival in Thailand, officials were only able to provide them with limited information in practice. In addition, observers reported labor officials interviewed workers in the presence of their employers, brokers, and armed police at post-arrival centers, which may have deterred workers from reporting exploitation. MOL also worked with NGOs to provide services at 10 migrant worker assistance centers. During the reporting period, the government held a meeting with civil society, government agencies, and the private sector to evaluate these centers. The government worked with NGO-operated centers located near fishing markets to provide skills training, health screenings, and other resources to raise awareness of workers’ rights. Provincial labor offices, migrant worker assistance centers, and other government agencies did not adequately investigate migrant workers complaints or refer suspected labor violations, including those indicative of forced labor, to relevant agencies. In addition, workers’ past negative interactions with authorities and a lack of availability of interpreters at some labor offices deterred migrant workers from reporting exploitation.

During the reporting period the government transferred the authority of the Command Center for Combating Illegal Fishing (CCCIF), which operated 32 port-in port-out (PIPO) centers and 19 additional forward inspection points (FIP), to the Department of Fisheries, while the newly established Thai Maritime Enforcement Command Center (Thai-MECC) oversaw PIPO and FIP operations. PIPO centers performed inspections to verify whether fishing vessels were operating legally and implemented a risk-based assessment system to identify target vessels for inspection. Labor inspectors working in PIPO teams verified crew lists using biometric data and worker interviews. The government banned long-haul Thai-flagged vessels from operating in international waters from 2016 to 2018 and permitted two vessels to renew their licenses to fish in international waters in 2019, with requirements that they return to Thailand every year. From February to September 2019, PIPO centers conducted 53,860 inspections at-port and 6,605 at-sea and found 23 and 330 infringements, respectively. Among these, authorities identified only two cases involving labor violations, which involved failure to provide an employment contract and failure to pay workers’ wages via bank transfer. The government has never reported identifying trafficking victims as a result of PIPO labor inspections. In addition, resource constraints during the transition of inspection authority from CCCIF to Thai-MECC resulted in reduced inspection rates for two months during the year. The government introduced a manual for PIPO centers on standardized inspection practices and, although still inconsistent, centers increasingly utilized universal checklists for inspection operations compared to previous years. In addition, observers reported inspectors more frequently conducted interviews with victim-centered practices, and all PIPO centers had translators available for inspections. Nonetheless, some inspection teams lacked translators for some workers’ languages, did not board vessels during inspections, did not separate workers away from owners, captains, or brokers for interviews, or conduct pre- and post- inspection team meetings away from vessel owners or captains; these practices likely deterred some workers or inspectors from revealing information due to fears of retaliation. In addition, at-sea inspections did not sufficiently include checks for labor violations or consistently have translators available for interviewing foreign crewmembers. PIPOs did not universally apply a standardized procedure for referring cases of fishermen who went missing at sea, including to identify indicators of trafficking on the vessels in which they went missing, and an increasing number of crew members went missing at sea during the reporting period.

The government did not report how many inspections of adult entertainment businesses officials conducted in 2019, compared to 7,497 in 2018. In 2019, DL PW conducted 2,116 inspections at high-risk workplaces, including sugarcane farms, garment factories, seafood processing facilities, pig farms, and poultry farms, finding 1,017 workplaces operating in violation of labor laws. Some local observers reported some factories received advance warning of labor inspections, which may have hampered the ability of officials to identify labor violations, including those indicative of forced labor. The government continued to grant citizenship to stateless persons. The government made efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts, including by displaying a video in four languages discouraging child sex tourism in Thai airports and on Thai airline flights. In addition, the government coordinated with foreign governments to deny entry to known sex offenders. The government provided anti-trafficking training to its diplomatic personnel.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Thailand, and traffickers exploit Thai victims abroad. Traffickers subject Thai nationals to forced labor and sex trafficking in Thailand and in countries in North America, Europe, Africa, Asia, and the Middle East. Members of ethnic minorities, highland persons, and stateless persons in Thailand have experienced instances of abuse indicative of trafficking. Labor and sex traffickers exploit women, men, LGBTI individuals, and children from Thailand, other Southeast Asian countries, Sri Lanka, Russia, Uzbekistan, and some African countries in Thailand. Traffickers use Thailand as a transit country for victims from China, North Korea, Vietnam, Bangladesh, India, and Burma whom traffickers subject to sex trafficking and forced labor in countries such as Malaysia, Indonesia, Singapore, Russia, South Korea, the United States, and countries in western Europe. The North Korean government may have forced North Koreans to work in Thailand. Children from Thailand, Burma, Laos, and Cambodia are victims of sex trafficking in brothels, massage parlors, bars, karaoke lounges, hotels, and private residences. Traffickers increasingly induce young Thai girls and boys to perform sex acts through videos and photos on the internet, sometimes by blackmailing victims with explicit images. Children in orphanages are at risk of trafficking. Some parents or brokers force children from Thailand, Cambodia, and Burma to sell flowers or other items in streets, beg, or work in domestic service in urban areas.

Labor traffickers exploit Thai and migrant workers in commercial fishing and related industries, the poultry industry, manufacturing, agriculture, domestic work, and street begging. Traffickers exploit some migrants in labor trafficking often through debt-based coercion, deceptive recruitment practices, retention of identity documents and ATM cards, illegal wage deductions, and other means. Brokers, recruitment agencies, and others impose excessive fees on workers before and after they arrive in Thailand. Vessel owners, brokers, and senior vessel crew traffickers subject Thai, Burmese, Cambodian, Vietnamese, and Indonesian men and boys to forced labor on Thai and foreign-owned fishing boats. Some are paid little or irregularly, incur debts from brokers and employers, work as much as 18 to 20 hours per day for seven days a week, and without adequate food, water or medical supplies. Some boat captains threaten, beat, and drug fishermen to work longer. Some trafficking victims in the fishing sector had difficulty returning home due to isolated workplaces, unpaid wages, and the lack of legitimate identity documents or safe means to travel. Employers in fishing and seafood processing often made confusing wage deductions for documentation fees, advances, and other charges, making it difficult for workers to account for their wages accurately. Various research published in 2019 and 2020 found that between 14 and 18 percent of migrant fishermen were exploited in forced labor in the Thai fishing industry, indicating traffickers exploited thousands of workers on fishing vessels.

Corruption continues to undermine anti-trafficking efforts. Some government officials are directly complicit in trafficking crimes, including through accepting bribes or loans from business owners and brothels that exploit victims. Corrupt immigration officials facilitate trafficking by accepting bribes from brokers and smugglers along Thai borders. Credible reports indicate some corrupt officials protect brothels, other commercial sex venues, factory owners, and fishing vessel owners from raids, inspections, and prosecutions and collude with traffickers. Some local police reportedly withhold information from prosecutors to protect traffickers. Some government officials profit from bribes and direct involvement in extortion from and exploitation of migrants.

TIMOR-LESTE: TIER 2 WATCH LIST
The Government of Timor-Leste does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. Those efforts included re-establishing funding to NGOs for victim services and integrating an anti-trafficking curriculum, created and provided by a foreign government, in some of its trainings for officials. However, the government did not demonstrate overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period. For the fourth consecutive year, the government did not obtain any trafficking convictions. The only potential trafficking victim, compared with 65 potential victims in 2018, was identified by an NGO—the government did not confirm any trafficking cases and significantly decreased the number of trafficking investigations. Victim protection services remained inadequate, and the government did not finalize or approve government-wide standard operating procedures (SOPs) for victim identification for the fifth consecutive year—a critical need as official understanding of trafficking remained low and authorities continued to detain and deport potential trafficking victims for immigration violations without performing screening procedures. Therefore Timor-Leste was downgraded to Tier 2 Watch List.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Increase investigations of trafficking offenses, proactively initiate prosecutions, and convict and punish traffickers, including complicit officials, in accordance with anti-trafficking laws. • Finalize, implement, and train all relevant officials on formal procedures for victim identification among vulnerable populations, including individuals in commercial sex, domestic workers, and migrant workers on fishing vessels, and employ proper screening procedures upon detention or prior to initiating deportation. • Amend the anti-trafficking provision of the penal code to ensure that force, fraud, or coercion are not a required element of sex trafficking cases involving 17-year old children. • Strengthen efforts to protect victims from arrest, deportation, or other punishment for unlawful acts which traffickers compelled them to commit. •
Increase resources for protective services focusing on trafficking victims and proactively offer male victims the same services offered to female victims. • Establish SOPs on referring victims to appropriate care and train officials on their use. • Establish the human trafficking commission. • Develop a current national action plan on trafficking and adequately fund its implementation. • Finalize data collection procedures.

PROSECUTION
The government decreased law enforcement efforts. Articles 163 and 164 of the criminal code criminalized all forms of labor trafficking and some forms of sex trafficking and prescribed penalties of eight to 25 years’ imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Inconsistent with international law, the law required a demonstration of force, fraud, or coercion to constitute a sex trafficking offense involving a 17-year-old child, and therefore did not criminalize all forms of child sex trafficking. The government did not collect detailed data on trafficking, and the government only collected aggregate data on vulnerable persons and not trafficking-specific data. The government reported it investigated 13 potential trafficking cases—a significant decrease from 65 in 2018, 267 in 2017, and 176 in 2016. The government closed four cases for insufficient evidence while nine cases remained pending at the end of the reporting period. In addition, four case investigations from previous reporting periods remained ongoing. Local NGOs identified and referred one trafficking case to the government during the reporting period; however, the prosecutor general’s office (PGO) did not open an investigation. Subsequently, the government did not confirm any trafficking cases, a substantial decrease from five in 2018, nine in 2017, and 79 in 2016. Authorities did not initiate any trafficking indictments in 2019, compared with four in 2018. For the fourth consecutive year, the government did not obtain any convictions during the reporting period. In 2018, a district administrator was accused of raping a child sex trafficking victim and attempting to bribe her to not report the case; at the end of this reporting period the case was still with the PGO for review while the district administrator remained in his position. In a previous reporting period, the government reported referring a case of an immigration official who allegedly facilitated labor trafficking of Bangladeshi workers to the PGO; the government reported for the second consecutive year the case was ongoing.

The government included anti-trafficking curriculum, created and provided by a foreign government, in its judicial sector training. The Legal Training Center and the Office of the Prosecutor General also reported the inclusion of this curriculum in training for new judges, prosecutors, defense attorneys, and for current members of the judiciary, and confirmed delivering the training to five prosecutors in the PGO and five investigators from the Central Cabinet of Organized Crime in the PGO during the reporting period. The National Police confirmed recruits received training on how to identify trafficking victims as part of their onboarding curriculum. The government did not report the number of officials trained on anti-trafficking during the reporting period; officials’ understanding of trafficking or the requirements of the law reportedly remained inadequate, hindering overall progress.

PROTECTION
The government decreased efforts to protect victims. Immigration and police officials reported their ad hoc use of trafficking indicators based on the Bali Process to identify victims; however—for the fifth consecutive year—the government has not finalized or disseminated comprehensive, government-wide SOPs for victim identification. The government did not report its proactive identification of any victims; NGOs referred one potential trafficking victim to the government—but the PGO did not open a formal investigation and therefore did not confirm any individuals as trafficking victims. This was a significant decrease from the 65 potential trafficking victims identified in 2018. The police provided emergency services to immediately stabilize a potential victim, and a government-funded NGO provided subsequent rehabilitative, mental health, and travel coordination services. The government re-established providing $8,000 each to two NGOs to provide shelter, legal, and psycho-social services to trafficking victims, despite limited availability of funds for the government. While one of the NGOs provided services to the potential trafficking victim it identified, the government’s technical field officers and 97 national police victim protection unit investigators charged with the identification and referral of victims to services did not report identifying or referring any trafficking victims to services. Adult victims may leave shelters unattended. An international organization continued to assess the availability and the quality of victim care as poor and below international standards and noted that while the government stated it provided services to both men and women, its existing victim assistance was structured for domestic violence victims, who were overwhelmingly female.

Law enforcement routinely performed raids on areas known for commercial sex, which was legal in the country, in part to assess immigration status. According to immigration officials, police, and media sources, authorities detained en masse foreign women in commercial sex—who may have been possible victims of sex trafficking—during such raids and deported them without screening for trafficking indicators. In May 2019, authorities arrested and deported 13 women in commercial sex from Vietnam, China, and Indonesia, for visa violations, without screening the women for trafficking indicators, similar to a case reported in the previous reporting period. Immigration officials reported traffickers coached victims to state they were voluntarily in commercial sex, which officials reported made it difficult for them to identify victims. The government had not yet completed implementing regulations and guidance on the 2017 Law on Preventing and Combating Human Trafficking, which stated trafficking victims may not be detained, accorded or judged for having entered or resided illegally in Timor-Leste, nor for having participated in unlawful acts committed as a direct consequence of the victim’s trafficking situation. The government did not provide foreign victims with alternatives to their removal to countries where they may face hardship or retribution. Although the government did not officially identify any victims of trafficking, the government funded the one NGO-identified potential victim’s repatriation.

PREVENTION
The government decreased efforts to prevent trafficking. Though the government did not create a commission to combat trafficking as mandated in the 2017 trafficking law, it continued to use the interagency anti-trafficking working group, led by the Office of the Prime Minister and Ministry of Justice (MOJ), to coordinate anti-trafficking efforts. The working group met six times during the reporting period. The MOJ previously drafted a national action plan in 2018; MOJ had not yet presented the plan to the Council of Ministers. The government had yet to approve the working group’s request from an earlier reporting period for a budget to implement the action plan. The government did not conduct research to assess the human trafficking problem in its country, nor did it systematically monitor its anti-trafficking efforts. The government did not have an anti-trafficking hotline. The government did not take measures to reduce the demand for commercial sex.
TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Timor-Leste, and traffickers exploit victims from Timor-Leste abroad. Traffickers lead Timorese women, girls, and occasionally young men and boys from rural areas to the capital with the promise of employment or education and exploit them in sex trafficking or domestic servitude. Traffickers exploit Timorese men in forced labor in agriculture, construction, and mining. Some Timorese family members place children in bonded household and agricultural labor, primarily in domestic rural areas but also abroad, to pay off family debts. Traffickers deceive young men and women and adult women with promises of scholarship opportunities or employment in Indonesia, Malaysia, and other countries in the region; often, traffickers take the victim to a different country than promised, withhold their passports, pay them little to nothing, and force them into labor, including domestic servitude. Frequently, Timorese victims overseas first transit through the porous border with Indonesia; some remain and are exploited in Indonesia. Sex traffickers in Timor-Leste prey on women from East and Southeast Asia. Transnational traffickers may be members of Indonesian or Chinese organized crime syndicates, who rotate foreign victims of sex trafficking in and out of the country for the length of a 30-day tourist visa to avoid raising the suspicions of law enforcement officers through visa overstay violations. Traffickers also recruit Timorese women, send them to China, Indonesia, or Malaysia, and force them into commercial sex. Police accept bribes from establishments involved in trafficking or from traffickers attempting to cross borders illegally. Traffickers exploit foreign fishing crews in forced labor on foreign-flagged vessels that transit Timor-Leste waters.

TOGO: TIER 2
The Government of Togo does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Togo remained on Tier 2. These efforts included identifying an increased number of victims and investigating and prosecuting more suspected traffickers. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. Authorities convicted fewer traffickers, and officials failed to update the government’s national action plan for the 12th consecutive year. Additionally, the government did not finalize its pending decree to create a national anti-trafficking committee, despite the support of law enforcement officers, judicial officials, and civil society organizations.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Council of Ministers finalize and adopt the pending decree to create a Trafficking in Persons National Committee to improve governmental coordination. • Update existing victim referral manuals to include victim identification standard operating procedures (SOPs) and train law enforcement and justice sector personnel on those procedures to increase the number of victims identified and referred to protective services. • Provide anti-trafficking training to law enforcement and judicial officials to increase their ability to effectively prosecute trafficking cases. • Enact anti-trafficking legislation that includes provisions for victim protection, and implement measures that incentivize victims to participate in the law enforcement and judicial process, including witness protection, as well as the provision of shelter, medical care, and psycho-social services. • Work with NGOs and international organizations to increase the provision of protective services to all trafficking victims. • Draft and implement an updated national action plan that incorporates adult victims and increases coordination with NGOs, neighboring countries, and regional organizations. • Develop a data collection and information management system to organize law enforcement and victim referral data, in collaboration with NGOs and international organizations.

PROSECUTION
The government maintained law enforcement efforts. Articles 317 through 320 of the penal code criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of 10 to 20 years’ imprisonment and fines between 10 million and 50 million West African CFA francs (CFA) ($17,180 and $85,910) for offenses involving an adult victim and 20 to 30 years’ imprisonment and fines between 20 million and 50 million CFA ($34,360 and $85,910) for offenses involving a child victim. These penalties were sufficiently stringent, and with regard to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape.

The Ministry of Justice’s anti-trafficking cell reported investigating 60 cases involving 95 suspects in 2019, compared with investigating 62 suspected traffickers in 2018. Officials reported prosecuting 54 suspects in 2019 versus 49 in 2018. During the reporting period, authorities convicted three traffickers, compared with eight during the previous reporting period; courts sentenced the three traffickers to between 12 months’ to 10 years’ imprisonment. The government did not report investigating, prosecuting, or convicting any officials complicit in human trafficking offenses, although judicial corruption may have hindered some trafficking investigations during the reporting period. Officials reported adjudicating some forced child labor cases through informal mediation processes.

The government continued to provide written instructions on victim identification to its law enforcement and immigration officials through the course of their basic training. One urban law enforcement unit stated the government provided comprehensive trafficking in persons training for 10 of the unit’s 30 officers during the reporting period, although frequent turnover hindered the development of the unit’s institutional knowledge. In December 2019, the government finalized its tripartite agreement with Benin and Burkina Faso to synchronize law enforcement efforts on transnational trafficking cases, although officials did not report using the agreement to investigate any cross-border cases or extradite any suspects.

PROTECTION
The government increased efforts to identify victims but did not report if it referred and provided care to all victims. In 2019, officials reported identifying 225 child victims of trafficking (19 boys and 206 girls) and 87 adult victims (38 men and 49 women), compared with 118 child victims and 86 adult victims in 2018. Officials used written manuals from 2007 to identify and refer victims to services in coordination with NGOs; however, the manuals did not include SOPs for identifying victims among high-risk populations. NGOs reported the government’s victim identification and referral processes were effective and the Ministries of Social Action,
The government included French, Kabiyé, and Ewe languages and reported the campaign reached approximately 20,000 Togolese over the course of the previous reporting period. In 2018, officials reported the hotline received approximately 118 trafficking-specific calls resulting in an unknown number of victims identified. The government did not report repatriating any victims in 2019, compared with repatriating nine trafficking victims in 2018.

The government continued to run a toll-free helpline, Allo 10-11 16 hours per day, seven days a week; officials reported out of 13,769 calls the hotline received in 2019, 5,506 were substantive, resulting in the identification of 97 child trafficking victims (12 boys and 85 girls). The MSA provided cell phones to Allo 10-11’s network of 150 contacts to facilitate nationwide coverage and utilized an informal referral system when callers identified potential victims. In 2018, officials reported the hotline received approximately 118 trafficking-specific calls resulting in an unknown number of victims identified. The government did not report repatriating any victims in 2019, compared with repatriating nine trafficking victims in 2018.

The government did not have a formal process to encourage victims’ participation in the investigation and prosecution of their traffickers. While there were no reports the government penalized any trafficking victims for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, authorities may have detained or deported some victims due to the lack of victim identification SOPs and some officials’ limited understanding of the crime.

PREVENTION

The government demonstrated mixed efforts to prevent trafficking in persons; while its nationwide awareness campaign reached more people, it decreased funding for the campaign, and the government’s lack of overall coordination continued to hinder its anti-trafficking efforts. The government managed its anti-child trafficking efforts and dissemination of information through the National Committee for the Reception and Social Integration of Child Victims of Trafficking (French acronym CNARSEVT), which routinely convened during the year. CNARSEVT acted as the country’s central hub of information for trafficking in Togo; however, data collection and reporting remained weak during the reporting period. The government drafted but did not finalize a decree to create a Trafficking in Persons National Committee—a key recommendation of NGOs and working-level officials to mitigate Togo’s coordination challenges—and has not updated its anti-trafficking national action plan since 2008.

The government allocated seven million FCFA ($12,030) to continue a nationwide awareness campaign during the reporting period, compared with reportedly budgeting 174.6 million FCFA ($300,000) to the Directorate for Child Protection to launch the awareness campaign in 2018. The campaign targeted urban and rural areas, used radio interviews, and featured signage in schools, public buildings, and traditional chiefs’ halls. Officials estimated the initiative reached approximately 30,000 citizens during the reporting period in the Maritime, Kara, and Savanes Regions where many trafficking victims originate or transit; the government reported the campaign reached approximately 20,000 Togolese over the course of the previous reporting period. The government included French, Kabyé, and Ewe languages in the campaign, which involved parents, community-based organizations, government officials, and religious leaders. Additionally, officials collaborated with the Governments of Benin and Ghana to sensitize communities along the Abidjan-Lagos corridor. The government continued to employ a network of “vigilance committees” in more populated villages across the country to provide education on trafficking and report cases to the government, although the effectiveness of these committees varied greatly.

Similar to last year and despite reports of fraudulent recruiters facilitating the exploitation of Togolese abroad, authorities did not report investigating any foreign labor recruiters for trafficking crimes. The Ministries of Labor and Social Action regulated labor recruitment firms, but the government’s weak information management systems hindered its ability to provide enforcement statistics. The government worked to reduce the demand for forced child labor by continuing to partner with traditional religious leaders to eliminate exploitation in religious “apprenticeships.” These “apprenticeships” involve parents entrusting their children to religious leaders for education and employment purposes, who exploit the children in forced domestic work, or sexual slavery when parents are unable to pay “apprenticeship fees.” The government distributed an unknown number of birth certificates in coordination with NGOs; the lack of identification documents contributed to an increased vulnerability to trafficking in persons.

The government did not take any discernible measures to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. Officials provided anti-trafficking training to Togolese troops prior to their deployment abroad on international peacekeeping missions. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs provided its diplomats a guide to hiring domestic workers but did not report delivering trafficking-specific training.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Togo, and traffickers exploit victims from Togo abroad. The western border of the Plateau region, which provides easy access to major roads between Lomé and Accra, Ghana, remained a primary area traffickers used to transport victims during the reporting period. NGOs noted the Abidjan-Lagos corridor remains a prominent route for movement-based trafficking of persons—as well as the smuggling of illicit goods—with criminals using Togo as a transit country. Civil society actors and law enforcement officers reported the country’s rise as a regional economic and logistics hub has led to a corresponding increase in trafficking and smuggling. Families and trusted intermediaries take advantage of high levels of poverty throughout the country to exploit many Togolese trafficking victims, with the Centrale and Savanes regions serving as primary source regions. Traffickers force Togolese children to work in the agricultural sector—particularly on coffee, cocoa, and cotton farms—as well as in stone and sand quarries, where children and adults break rocks by hand. Observers stated trafficking networks are predominantly community-based and loosely organized by local actors.

NGOs and government officials reported markets selling Togolese children for commercial sex acts (“small girls markets” or devissime) exist in Lomé and elsewhere in the country. Traffickers visit rural areas in the north and central regions to recruit children from impoverished parents to sell in these markets. These illicit recruiters promise lucrative employment for the children and pay parents an advance before transporting the minors to Lomé, where traffickers subject minors to forced labor as domestic servants, roadside vendors, and porters, or exploit them in child sex trafficking. Togolese businesspeople exploit boys through forced labor in construction, salvage yards, mines, and as mechanics, often involving hazardous machinery.

Labor, and Justice were key partners on prevention, protection, and investigation efforts, respectively.

In Lomé, the Ministry of Social Affairs (MSA) continued to run a toll-free helpline, Allo 10-11 16 hours per day, seven days a week; officials reported out of 13,769 calls the hotline received in 2019, 5,506 were substantive, resulting in the identification of 97 child trafficking victims (12 boys and 85 girls). The MSA provided cell phones to Allo 10-11’s network of 150 contacts to facilitate nationwide coverage and utilized an informal referral system when callers identified potential victims. In 2018, officials reported the hotline received approximately 118 trafficking-specific calls resulting in an unknown number of victims identified. The government did not report repatriating any victims in 2019, compared with repatriating nine trafficking victims in 2018.

The Directorate-General for Child Protection provided psycho-social and health services in addition to shelter to 147 child victims in 2019. MSA continued to operate the Reference Center for the Guidance and Care of Children in a Difficult Situation (French acronym CROPESDI). The CROPESDI shelter, located in Lomé, received victims referred by the Allo 10-11 hotline and provided shelter, legal, medical, and social services before transferring them to NGO-managed care facilities. Officials did not report the number of victims these shelters served during the reporting period. The government reportedly provides foreign trafficking victims the same access to shelters as domestic victims and performs a risk evaluation before it repatriates potential victims.

The government did not have a formal process to encourage victims’ participation in the investigation and prosecution of their traffickers. While there were no reports the government penalized any trafficking victims for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, authorities may have detained or deported some victims due to the lack of victim identification SOPs and some officials’ limited understanding of the crime.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Togo, and traffickers exploit victims from Togo abroad. The western border of the Plateau region, which provides easy access to major roads between Lomé and Accra, Ghana, remained a primary area traffickers used to transport victims during the reporting period. NGOs noted the Abidjan-Lagos corridor remains a prominent route for movement-based trafficking of persons—as well as the smuggling of illicit goods—with criminals using Togo as a transit country. Civil society actors and law enforcement officers reported the country’s rise as a regional economic and logistics hub has led to a corresponding increase in trafficking and smuggling. Families and trusted intermediaries take advantage of high levels of poverty throughout the country to exploit many Togolese trafficking victims, with the Centrale and Savanes regions serving as primary source regions. Traffickers force Togolese children to work in the agricultural sector—particularly on coffee, cocoa, and cotton farms—as well as in stone and sand quarries, where children and adults break rocks by hand. Observers stated trafficking networks are predominantly community-based and loosely organized by local actors.

NGOs and government officials reported markets selling Togolese children for commercial sex acts (“small girls markets” or devissime) exist in Lomé and elsewhere in the country. Traffickers visit rural areas in the north and central regions to recruit children from impoverished parents to sell in these markets. These illicit recruiters promise lucrative employment for the children and pay parents an advance before transporting the minors to Lomé, where traffickers subject minors to forced labor as domestic servants, roadside vendors, and porters, or exploit them in child sex trafficking. Togolese businesspeople exploit boys through forced labor in construction, salvage yards, mines, and as mechanics, often involving hazardous machinery.

Labor, and Justice were key partners on prevention, protection, and investigation efforts, respectively.

In Lomé, the Ministry of Social Affairs (MSA) continued to run a toll-free helpline, Allo 10-11 16 hours per day, seven days a week; officials reported out of 13,769 calls the hotline received in 2019, 5,506 were substantive, resulting in the identification of 97 child trafficking victims (12 boys and 85 girls). The MSA provided cell phones to Allo 10-11’s network of 150 contacts to facilitate nationwide coverage and utilized an informal referral system when callers identified potential victims. In 2018, officials reported the hotline received approximately 118 trafficking-specific calls resulting in an unknown number of victims identified. The government did not report repatriating any victims in 2019, compared with repatriating nine trafficking victims in 2018.

The government did not have a formal process to encourage victims’ participation in the investigation and prosecution of their traffickers. While there were no reports the government penalized any trafficking victims for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, authorities may have detained or deported some victims due to the lack of victim identification SOPs and some officials’ limited understanding of the crime.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Togo, and traffickers exploit victims from Togo abroad. The western border of the Plateau region, which provides easy access to major roads between Lomé and Accra, Ghana, remained a primary area traffickers used to transport victims during the reporting period. NGOs noted the Abidjan-Lagos corridor remains a prominent route for movement-based trafficking of persons—as well as the smuggling of illicit goods—with criminals using Togo as a transit country. Civil society actors and law enforcement officers reported the country’s rise as a regional economic and logistics hub has led to a corresponding increase in trafficking and smuggling. Families and trusted intermediaries take advantage of high levels of poverty throughout the country to exploit many Togolese trafficking victims, with the Centrale and Savanes regions serving as primary source regions. Traffickers force Togolese children to work in the agricultural sector—particularly on coffee, cocoa, and cotton farms—as well as in stone and sand quarries, where children and adults break rocks by hand. Observers stated trafficking networks are predominantly community-based and loosely organized by local actors.

NGOs and government officials reported markets selling Togolese children for commercial sex acts (“small girls markets” or devissime) exist in Lomé and elsewhere in the country. Traffickers visit rural areas in the north and central regions to recruit children from impoverished parents to sell in these markets. These illicit recruiters promise lucrative employment for the children and pay parents an advance before transporting the minors to Lomé, where traffickers subject minors to forced labor as domestic servants, roadside vendors, and porters, or exploit them in child sex trafficking. Togolese businesspeople exploit boys through forced labor in construction, salvage yards, mines, and as mechanics, often involving hazardous machinery.
Transnationally, fraudulent recruiters work with loosely affiliated networks to transport victims to Benin, Burkina Faso, Cote d’Ivoire, Gabon, Ghana, and Nigeria. Traffickers force victims to work in the following sectors: cocoa harvesting in Ghana and Cote d’Ivoire; palm wine production in rural Nigeria; gold mining in Burkina Faso; domestic service in urban Nigeria; and sex trafficking in Beninese and Nigerian bars and restaurants. Traffickers recruit children from Benin and Ghana and transport them to Togo for forced labor. Illicit networks exploit Ghanaian girls in sex trafficking in Togo. Every year from September to April, in order to search for economic opportunities, many Togolese adults and children migrate to Benin, Burkina Faso, Mali, and Niger, where criminal elements may exploit them in forced labor and sex trafficking. Nigerians force Togolese men to work in agriculture and Togolese women in domestic service in Nigeria. Some fraudulent labor agencies recruit Togolese and West African women for employment in Kuwait, Lebanon, Oman, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia, where wealthy families exploit them in domestic servitude or sex trafficking. Officials noted sex tourists from Lebanon, France, and Nigeria exploit children in Togo.

TONGA: TIER 2

The Government of Tonga does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Tonga remained on Tier 2. These efforts included training more police recruits on victim identification and trafficking investigations and providing funding for an NGO available to assist trafficking victims. Tongan police continued to utilize an Asian liaison officer trained to speak Mandarin Chinese to engage with Chinese citizens living in Tonga who may be vulnerable to trafficking. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. Authorities did not conduct any new trafficking investigations, develop procedures to proactively identify victims, or effectively coordinate governmental anti-trafficking efforts.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

Develop and fully implement procedures for proactive identification of trafficking victims among vulnerable groups.

• Increase efforts to proactively investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes.

• Amend trafficking laws to criminalize all forms of trafficking in line with the definition under international law, including offenses lacking cross-border movement.

• Develop, adopt, and implement a national action plan.

• Utilize the Asian liaison position to facilitate proactive identification of foreign victims and their referral to care.

• Provide explicit protections and benefits for trafficking victims, such as restitution, legal and medical benefits, and immigration relief.

• Develop and conduct anti-trafficking information and education campaigns.

• Accede to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol.

PROSECUTION

The government maintained anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. The Counter Terrorism and Transnational Organised Crime Act of 2013 did not criminalize all forms of trafficking because it required transnationality to constitute a trafficking offense. Additionally, inconsistent with the definition of trafficking under international law, the law did not include force, fraud, or coercion as an essential element of the crime. The law prescribed penalties of up to 15 years’ imprisonment for trafficking offenses involving adult victims and 20 years’ imprisonment for offenses involving children; these penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties for other serious crimes, such as rape. The government did not investigate any potential trafficking cases, compared to one investigation during the previous reporting period. Since convicting its first trafficker in April 2011, the government has not prosecuted or convicted any trafficking cases. The Tongan police force provided trafficking training to 30 new police recruits in 2019, compared with an unknown number of officials trained in 2018. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government employees complicit in trafficking offenses.

PROTECTION

The government maintained victim protection efforts. Since the government’s identification of four potential trafficking victims in 2015, the government has not identified any victims of trafficking. The government did not develop or employ systematic procedures for victim identification among at-risk groups, such as migrant workers or women in commercial sex. Tongan police utilized an Asian liaison officer trained to speak Mandarin Chinese to engage with Chinese citizens living in Tonga who may be vulnerable to trafficking. The government had procedures to refer victims of crime, including potential trafficking victims, to an NGO. The government provided an unknown amount of funding to an NGO for operations to assist adult female and child victims of crime, including shelter, counseling, and legal services, compared with 60,000 pa’anga ($27,160) in 2018 and 2017. Although no victims were identified during the year, adult female and child victims of trafficking would be eligible for these services. There were no shelter facilities available to male victims older than 14 years old; however, male counselors were available to assist male victims of any age. Under the immigration act, the principal immigration officer had broad discretionary authority to grant victims permits to stay in the country for any length of time necessary for their protection. Victims could receive asylum in Tonga if they feared retribution or hardship in their country of origin, although no trafficking victim has ever requested asylum.

PREVENTION

The government maintained efforts to prevent trafficking. The government’s trafficking task force was responsible for leading anti-trafficking efforts alongside the transnational crime unit of the police force. The government did not develop a national action plan, which reportedly continued to hinder governmental anti-trafficking coordination. The government did not conduct awareness campaigns. The government provided Fijian domestic workers with temporary work permits while their employers applied for permanent permits. Authorities provided briefings to Tongans participating in seasonal worker programs overseas, which included information on workers’ rights. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. The government did not provide anti-trafficking training to its diplomatic personnel. Tonga is not a party to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, some Tongan and foreign individuals are vulnerable to trafficking in Tonga, and some Tongans are vulnerable to trafficking abroad. East Asian women, especially those from China, who are recruited from their home countries for legitimate work in Tonga, are vulnerable to sex trafficking in clandestine establishments operating as legitimate businesses. Some Tongan women and children are vulnerable to forced labor in domestic work; Tongan children are vulnerable to sex trafficking. Reports indicate Fijians working in the domestic service industry in Tonga experience mistreatment indicative of labor trafficking. Tongan adults working overseas, including in Australia and New Zealand, are vulnerable to labor trafficking, including through withholding of wages and excessive work hours. Employers rush some workers to sign employment contracts they may not fully understand, and others are unable to retain copies of their contracts, exacerbating the potential for employers to exploit these workers in labor trafficking.

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO: TIER 2

The Government of Trinidad and Tobago does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Trinidad and Tobago remained on Tier 2. These efforts included screening and identifying more victims, investigating traffickers, including three potentially complicit officials, prosecuting eight suspected traffickers, and increasing anti-trafficking training for its officials. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. The government had yet to secure a conviction under its 2011 anti-trafficking law, funding for victim assistance was reduced, and the laws did not provide immigration relief for victims or allow educational opportunities for vulnerable refugee children.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

• Increase efforts to investigate, prosecute, and convict traffickers, including complicit officials and staff. • Provide adequate funding for robust trafficking investigations and victim services, including accommodations. • Train law enforcement and prosecutors in proactively identifying, obtaining, preserving, and corroborating evidence of trafficking. • Increase proactive victim identification, screening, and protection among migrants, asylum-seekers, and refugees so that they are not penalized for crimes traffickers compelled them to commit. • Reduce court delays and pretrial detention and ensure that private video testimony facilities are offered to victims. • Improve cooperation between the Counter Trafficking Unit (CTU), prosecutors, judiciary, and NGOs to increase the number of cases that proceed to trial. • Strengthen oversight, regulation, and inspections of private labor recruitment agencies and domestic work locations. • Increase trauma-informed training on trafficking for NGO, shelter, social services, and law enforcement staff to improve their ability to identify and care for potential trafficking victims. • Increase civil society representation on the anti-trafficking task force. • Draft a national action plan for the period beginning 2021.

PROSECUTION

The government maintained law enforcement efforts. The Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Act of 2011 criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of no less than 15 years’ imprisonment and a fine of no less than 500,000 Trinidad and Tobago dollars (TTD) ($74,660) for offenses involving an adult victim and no less than 20 years’ imprisonment and a fine of no less than one million TTD ($149,320) for those involving a child victim. These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. The government’s anti-trafficking unit investigated 36 possible cases of sex trafficking and labor trafficking, compared with 39 in 2018 and 38 in 2017. The government initiated two prosecutions and charged eight suspected traffickers in 2019, compared with four in 2018 and two in 2017. The government reported no convictions for trafficking during the reporting period and had not yet convicted a trafficker under its 2011 anti-trafficking law, due in part to a dramatic court backlog, causing cases to take several years to make their way through the system. The government passed several laws to reform the justice system’s lengthy delays in criminal trials, evidence collection issues, and insufficient judiciary personnel.

The Counter Trafficking Unit (CTU), under the Ministry of National Security, had the sole mandate for investigating human trafficking cases. The CTU collaborated with the national police Special Operations Response Team (SORT) and the intelligence-led task force to identify and monitor suspicious establishments. This team conducted six high-profile operations during the reporting period, resulting in the June 2019 release of two Chinese national forced to work in a factory and the detention of 15 perpetrators, eight of whom were charged under the TIP Act. Officials in law enforcement and observers reported that government officials have facilitated trafficking by accepting bribes from brothel owners to transport victims to various locations. During the reporting period, the government arrested three police officers on suspicion of trafficking and detained a police officer assisting other suspected traffickers in an anti-trafficking raid in November at a sports bar. In February, authorities arrested two other police officers in connection with trafficking, one of whom they charged with child trafficking. The case of a 2017 government employee charged with trafficking was still pending.

The government did not provide its budget allocations to the CTU for the reporting period for 2019 or 2018, compared to a seven million TTD ($1.05 million) budget reported in 2017. Officials confirmed the CTU is not adequately funded or staffed to handle trafficking for the entire country. The government collaborated with India to extradite a forced labor suspect and signed the CARICOM Arrest Warrant Treaty to facilitate regional law enforcement cooperation. In November, newspapers reported that the SORT team arrested a male Chinese national and a female Venezuelan national suspected of sex trafficking. The police academy with an international partner delivered a two-day combined live and video conference training for 116 officers from Trinidad and Tobago on the components of human trafficking in government facilities. The CTU provided anti-trafficking training to 130 defense force members, 582 local police, prison officers, and 142 front-line officers. The CTU also provided trafficking sensitization training to 15 judges and magistrates and presented a weekly bilingual radio program directed at the community of migrants and Venezuelan refugees.

PROTECTION

The government increased some protection efforts. The government identified 34 trafficking victims, an increase from 14 victims identified in 2018, 14 in 2017, and 13 in 2016. There were 33 adult and minor Venezuelan females identified as victims of sex trafficking and one male from India identified as a labor trafficking victim out of 180 vulnerable individuals law enforcement officials screened. A separate group of 46 female potential trafficking victims released from a group of suspected traffickers reported by media were also screened for trafficking. Authorities reported all identified victims received care and 22 victims from prior years continued to receive assistance during the reporting period, compared with 29 victims in 2018 and 14 in 2017. The CTU reported spending 120,000 TTD ($17,920) on victim protection and assistance in 2019, a decrease from 203,100 TTD ($30,330) in 2018 and 196,900 TTD ($29,700) in 2017. The government provided additional funding to children’s homes and adult victim accommodation through the Ministry of Social Development and Family Services. NGOs reported identifying and referring many additional victims to the CTU, but as the NGOs did not receive assistance or case follow-ups, NGOs reported they stopped referring them to the CTU. Outside experts noted there was insufficient government funding and personnel for comprehensive victim care. Some observers indicated that following police actions or immigration raids, authorities detained some foreign victims for violating immigration laws without screening for trafficking indicators or victim care—even though those unlawful acts occurred as part of the trafficking crime and traffickers may have compelled victims to commit them. The CTU reported intervening on behalf of some foreign victims to have them removed from detention centers to alternate sites.

The government jointly provided victim care services in conjunction with NGOs, which included accommodation, counseling, legal aid, consular services, medical and psychological services, assistance in their native language, reintegration for domestic victims and relocation for foreign victims, and in some cases skill and English language training. Observers reported a lack of appropriate shelters with adequate staff and security personnel. In February 2020, the cabinet established the Working Committee for the Delivery of Care to Trafficking Victims to improve quality of victim care. The government housed adult victims in a variety of locations; this varied from NGO-run shelters, government-funded accommodation, to international organization-funded accommodation based on the level of security risks and threats to the victim. Most female victims were housed in domestic violence shelters with strict rules restricting unchaperoned freedom of movement or communication outside. Observers noted that these restrictions caused some victims to run away from shelters or ask to be repatriated before investigations were completed. The government placed adult male victims at safe houses run by the security services. The Children’s Authority placed child victims in government-funded children’s homes in the community, although observers reported a lack of specialized care. While the government indicated victims were allowed to work and stay in country, in practice a majority were not allowed to work because of safety concerns. The government did not provide immigration relief to victims. Although the government agreed that an international body could conduct refugee status determinations, there was no impact on a trafficking victim’s legal status in country and refugee children could not access public education, rendering them more vulnerable to trafficking. Language interpretation services were not always available for counseling sessions and police interviews; experts reported shelters did not have bilingual staff or volunteers. In addition, some government officials noted a shortage of interpreters available to assist with foreign victim care and testimony. The CTU provided 24/7 security for victims who participated in court proceedings. Experts noted working-level staff at NGOs and shelters needed more training on trafficking indicators to better identify potential trafficking victims.

PREVENTION
The government increased efforts to prevent trafficking. The National Task Force Against Trafficking in Persons (task force) collaborated with the CTU on anti-trafficking efforts. The task force included the ministries of labor, immigration, national security, social development, foreign affairs, finance, the national police, the children’s authority, airports authority, and the director of public prosecutions. Experts continued to note a need for the government to add more NGO representation to the task force to strengthen government-NGO partnerships and receive more NGO input into government decision-making. The government continued implementation of the 2016-2020 national action plan, including delivering anti-trafficking training to 150 members of women’s NGOs. Quarterly reports of some of the activities are submitted to the task force and annual reports are prepared on the government’s anti-trafficking efforts and made available via open hearings and press releases.

The government conducted a series of awareness campaigns on sex and labor trafficking targeting children and the general public. The government used social media, airport advertisements, billboard advertisements, and publicized the hotline with flyers on trafficking distributed in movie houses and promoted the hotline during a weekly bilingual radio program. Authorities screened movies about trafficking at law and immigration trainings and on five local television stations as part of the World Day Against Trafficking. The labor ministry (MOLSED) produced three videos and a radio advertisement on labor trafficking and conducted outreach in schools, summer camps, and community councils to explain about child labor trafficking and distributed bookmarks to students on sex and labor trafficking. Forced labor cases are referred to the labor inspectorate for investigation, and the inspectorate meets with employers about paying employees for unpaid wages. Observers noted the oversight and regulation of domestic workers remained weak although domestic workers must be registered by their employers within 14 days or face a 5,000 TTD ($750) fine. The government did not report on the implementation of a new migration policy begun in 2018. MOLSED and the CTU drafted a memorandum of understanding to increase collaboration on sex trafficking and labor trafficking, including training for labor inspectors to enable them to refer potential trafficking victims to the police or immigration. The government operated a national trafficking hotline, which reported 30 calls resulting in the screening of six individuals and two identified foreign victims. Observers noted the need for more Spanish language services in the hotlines. The government made efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts by targeting men and boys at schools, barbershops, and in communities with an awareness-raising program directed by the Office of the Prime Minister.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Trinidad and Tobago, and traffickers exploit victims from Trinidad and Tobago abroad. The ongoing humanitarian crisis in neighboring Venezuela has contributed to an influx of refugees and migrants who are at high risk for trafficking. Traffickers lure women and girls from Colombia, the Dominican Republic, and Venezuela with offers of employment, many via social media, and subject them to sex trafficking in brothels and clubs. Traffickers are increasingly targeting and accompanying vulnerable foreign young women and girls between the ages of 15 and 21. Other vulnerable economic migrants arrive from countries in Africa, China, and other Caribbean countries. LGBTI persons are at risk for sex trafficking. Many victims enter the country legally via Trinidad’s international airport, while others enter illegally via small boats from Venezuela, which is only seven miles offshore. Migrants from the Caribbean region and from Asia, in particular those lacking legal status, are at risk for forced labor in domestic service and the retail sector. Corruption in police and immigration has been associated with facilitating commercial and sex trafficking.
The Government of Tunisia does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Tunisia remained on Tier 2. These efforts included an increase in investigations of alleged traffickers and an increase in victim identification efforts. It also implemented the national victim referral mechanism, directly provided more than 150 identified victims with protection services—including medical and psycho-social assistance—and continued to coordinate with civil society organizations to provide additional services to victims and to train officials. The government also established a network of trafficking survivors to advise the government on anti-trafficking measures and best practices. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in some key areas. The government’s efforts to prosecute and convict traffickers decreased. Continual lack of understanding of trafficking among judicial and law enforcement officials inhibited authorities from effectively bringing traffickers to justice. While the government provided some services for victims, overall government services appropriate for the needs of all trafficking victims—including male, female, and child victims—across the country remained limited.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

- Fully implement the national victim referral mechanism using a victim-centered approach to ensure officials refer all trafficking victims to appropriate protection services, and train law enforcement and judicial authorities on appropriately referring victims to care. • Implement formal procedures for all relevant officials to screen and proactively identify sex and labor trafficking victims—particularly among vulnerable groups such as domestic workers, undocumented migrants, street children, and persons in commercial sex—and train officials on their use. • Provide adequate protection services to male, female, and child victims of all forms of trafficking, including appropriate shelter, psycho-social, and rehabilitative services tailored specifically to trafficking victims. • Train staff at government-operated centers for vulnerable populations to provide trafficking victims with appropriate and specialized care, and increase resources for provision of care at these centers. • Use the anti-trafficking law to investigate, prosecute, and convict traffickers, and sentence convicted traffickers to significant prison terms. • Train and build the capacity of judicial and law enforcement officials on application of the anti-trafficking law, investigative techniques and evidence collection specific to trafficking cases, witness and victim protection best practices during trial, and alternatives to victim testimony. • Improve coordination among government ministries to combat trafficking. • Provide funding or in-kind support to NGOs that provide care to trafficking victims. • Develop procedures, especially for law enforcement, judicial, and border officials, to ensure victims are not punished for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, such as prostitution and immigration violations.

PROSECUTION

The government increased efforts to investigate potential trafficking cases but decreased efforts to prosecute and convict alleged traffickers. Tunisia’s anti-trafficking law, Organic Law 2016-61, enacted in July 2016, criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of 10 years’ imprisonment and a fine of 50,000 Tunisian dinar (TND) ($18,040) for offenses involving adult victims and 15 years’ imprisonment and a fine of 50,000-100,000 TND ($18,040-$36,080) for those involving child victims. These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as kidnapping. The National Authority to Combat Trafficking in Persons (“National Authority”)—the government’s lead agency coordinating anti-trafficking efforts—reported the lack of an independent budget and insufficient capacity building hindered the government’s efforts to fully implement the law. Furthermore, civil society organizations reported there continued to be a low level of awareness among police and judicial authorities on the application of the anti-trafficking law and handling of trafficking cases. Due to their lack of familiarity with the law, some judicial officials used other laws that had less stringent sentences to prosecute and convict trafficking offenders. Observers also reported that courts dismissed several potential trafficking cases due to lack of evidence on the exploitative nature of the crime; lack of victim or witness testimony also created challenges for officials to successfully prosecute and convict trafficking offenders.

From April 2019 to January 2020, the Ministry of Interior (MOI) conducted a total of 775 investigations, which included 361 cases of forced labor, 348 cases of “economic exploitation” (forced labor), 54 cases of sexual exploitation, and 12 cases of “slavery-like practices.” The majority of economic exploitation cases involved female victims from Cote d’Ivoire, and the cases of sexual exploitation involved female Tunisian victims. This demonstrated a significant increase from the 349 investigations the government initiated in the previous reporting period. The National Authority—with the assistance of a legal aid NGO—reported the government prosecuted 31 alleged traffickers, which included 23 forced labor cases and six sex trafficking cases; however, none of the cases were tried under the anti-trafficking law. The government did not convict any traffickers during the reporting period. These statistics represented a significant decrease from the 66 convictions and one conviction the government initiated in the previous reporting period. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government officials complicit in human trafficking offenses.

Every tribunal in Tunisia had a prosecutor and investigative judge responsible for overseeing human trafficking cases and leading anti-trafficking training programs for judicial officials. Additionally, the MOI’s special victims unit, established in 2017, included brigades of judicial police and national guard officers throughout the country who were specialized in cybercrimes and assistance to victims of trafficking and gender-based violence. The Ministry of Justice (MOJ) continued to monitor and maintain statistics on human trafficking cases brought before the judiciary through a specialized office; this office also had the authority to conduct research on the application of the anti-trafficking law and advise the minister of justice on policies related to the implementation of the law. However, lack of a judicial database and bureaucratic delays prevented the MOJ from providing detailed data on trafficking prosecutions and convictions during the reporting period. Throughout the reporting period, the government—in coordination with international and civil society organizations—conducted a wide variety of anti-trafficking trainings for law enforcement and judicial officials, healthcare practitioners, and social workers. Nevertheless, insufficient training of judicial and law enforcement officials hindered investigative techniques and victim identification efforts. During the reporting period, the government expanded cooperation with the governments of Senegal and Cote d’Ivoire to exchange information about potential trafficking cases.

PROTECTION

The government significantly increased efforts to proactively identify trafficking victims and it provided some victims with protection services. Between April 2019 and February 2020, the National Authority identified 1,313 trafficking victims from among the potential victims referred to it by government agencies—including the MOI and the Ministry of Women, Family, Childhood, and the Elderly (MWFC)—and civil society organizations; this represented a substantial increase from the 780 victims it identified in the previous reporting period. More than half of identified victims were women and children, and the majority were foreign victims of economic exploitation primarily from Cote d’Ivoire. The government referred or directly provided assistance to all identified victims of trafficking. The Ministry of Health (MOH) provided healthcare to 69 trafficking victims, including both Tunisian and foreign victims, and the Ministry of Social Affairs (MSA) provided psychological and socio-economic assistance to 83 victims. NGOs reported that the government continued to collaborate with civil society organizations to provide assistance to the remaining victims in need. The government also repatriated and provided psycho-social, medical, and employment assistance to three female Tunisian trafficking victims, who Tunisian authorities identified abroad in 2019.

At the end of the reporting period, the government finalized and began implementation of the national victim referral mechanism, which streamlined all stages of the referral process from victim identification and assistance to civil and criminal proceedings. Judicial and border police continued to have practices in place to screen for potential trafficking victims among those who overstayed their legal residency or who were subject to expulsion after serving a prison sentence. The government also prepared a practical guide for security officers and judicial police on victim identification techniques. In addition, the MSA continued to train all labor inspectors to identify potential trafficking victims; there were 25 labor inspectors and 24 social workers in the MSA’s labor inspectorate that were trained as specialized points of contact for child trafficking victims. Despite these efforts, the national anti-trafficking commission and MOI special victims unit were the only government entities authorized to officially identify trafficking victims, thereby allowing victims access to state-run services and providing exemptions from exit visas for foreign victims. NGOs continued to report that the limited number of ministries who could legally identify a trafficking victim slowed the process for victims to receive care. Moreover, insufficient interagency coordination and resources reportedly hindered the timely identification and referral to services for trafficking victims. In addition, civil society organizations reported the special victims unit did not have sufficient personnel or resources to provide adequate assistance to trafficking victims, nor did personnel have the cultural understanding or training to communicate with vulnerable migrants from the sub-Saharan African population, including potential trafficking victims. Civil society organizations also expressed concern that the government’s process to provide exemption from visa penalties for foreign trafficking victims was slow and cumbersome, thereby creating difficulties for civil society to assist victims in a timely manner. Due to a lack of systematic victim identification procedures and policies, authorities may have punished some unidentified victims for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, such as prostitution or immigration violations.

The MSA continued to operate two centers in Sousse and Sfax that had designated areas available for victims of all forms of trafficking where victims could enter and exit freely and return on a regular basis for assistance seeking employment. The MSA—in collaboration with an international organization—continued to provide training for the centers’ staff on rehabilitation and care for trafficking victims. The MSA and National Authority continued to uphold an agreement, signed in January 2019, for the MSA to dedicate one room in all social care centers for victims of trafficking and violence. An MOH-operated hospital in Tunis continued to have a unit with trained personnel dedicated to caring for victims of violence, including sexual exploitation, which offered psychosocial support, medical documentation, and legal expertise; the government did not report if this unit assisted any trafficking victims during the reporting period. The government ran 79 youth centers around the country that provided psycho-educational services to at-risk children ages six to 18, including child trafficking victims, one of which was dedicated solely for abandoned or otherwise vulnerable children, including child trafficking victims; however, the government did not report if any child trafficking victims received assistance at this center during the reporting period. Civil society contacts reported there were overall limited services throughout the country for child trafficking victims, especially long-term, reintegration, and relocation services. Despite the centers and services provided by the MSA and MOH, the National Authority and civil society partners continued to report the country lacked sufficient shelters to support vulnerable populations, including trafficking victims. Although the National Authority and NGOs partnered to reintegrate victims into society, the lack of resources, trained personnel, and sufficient shelter beds created challenges in doing so. Additionally, civil society organizations reported there were not adequate shelter or safe spaces available for male victims of trafficking and other forms of violence; there were only three government-run shelters that could accommodate male trafficking victims, but those shelters did not provide access to trained counselors, economic reintegration programs, or legal support. The government offered foreign trafficking victims legal alternatives to their removal to countries where they might face hardship or retribution. Under the anti-trafficking law, the government offered all identified foreign trafficking victims relief from deportation, and victims had the right to free legal aid to assist them in engaging in civil and criminal proceedings against their traffickers. During the reporting period, the government provided temporary relief from deportation for all identified foreign trafficking victims. The anti-trafficking law also allowed victims and witnesses of trafficking crimes access to psychological and physical protection services.

PREVENTION

The government significantly improved efforts to prevent trafficking. The government continued to implement its 2018-2023 national strategy to combat trafficking, and the MOJ continued to lead the National Authority, which included representatives from 12 ministries and experts from civil society. In July 2019, the government issued decree law number 2019-653, which established operating procedures and guidelines for the National Authority and four specialized commissions to focus on monitoring and evaluation, research, training and development, and tracking victim cases. Additionally, during the reporting period, the National Authority established a network of trafficking survivors that served as a council to share experiences, advise, and present recommendations to the committee to help improve its work. In February 2020, the National Authority—in partnership with an international organization—launched an online platform to provide training on how to combat and prevent human trafficking. The National Authority also strengthened its partnership with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) during the reporting period, which resulted in the MFA’s first victim referral and assistance repatriating Tunisian victims of trafficking abroad. During the reporting period, the National Authority completed an annual report that detailed its activities and recommendations on how to improve the government’s fight against human trafficking, which it presented at an international anti-trafficking conference in Tunis in January 2020. The government continued to conduct numerous anti-trafficking public awareness and information campaigns, at times in partnership with civil society organizations. The MOI also continued to place announcements on social media sites and newspapers to inform the public about fraudulent work contracts and forced labor. The government continued to operate a hotline to report potential trafficking cases, which was operational five days a week during regular business hours and whose operators spoke Arabic, French, and English. During the reporting period, the hotline received 3,960 calls that resulted in the identification of seven potential trafficking victims. Limited financial and personnel resources remained challenges to the government’s overall ability to address trafficking.

The government continued to make efforts to address fraudulent labor recruitment practices. The Agency for Placement Abroad in Private Establishments (EPPA) filed complaints against 30 private employers for cases of fraud, extortion, or abuses of Tunisian workers abroad; it also formally requested the MOI to shut down seven private employers who recruited workers without proper registration with the EPPA. In addition, the EPPA continued to periodically disseminate announcements in the media to raise awareness of unfair or illegal recruitment practices and informed the public about information on EPPA facilities and services. In addition, the Directorate General for Immigration continued to coordinate with the Minister of Vocational Training and Employment to combat illegal job recruitment agencies. The government maintained bilateral labor migration agreements with France and Switzerland, which contained provisions to prevent unfair labor recruitment practices and labor trafficking. Nevertheless, civil society organizations reported concerns the government did not provide sufficient initiatives to address the internal child domestic servitude problem. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts or child sex tourism.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Tunisia, and traffickers exploit victims from Tunisia abroad. Some Tunisian children are vulnerable to forced labor and sex trafficking in Tunisia. Some Tunisian girls working as domestic servants for wealthy families in Tunis and major coastal cities are highly vulnerable to trafficking, experiencing restrictions on movement, physical and psychological violence, and sexual abuse. According to experts, in 2017 Tunisian children—many of whom had dropped out of school and were between the ages of 11 and 12 years old—worked in small workshops, auto mechanic garages, and domestic work; some of these children may be vulnerable to trafficking. International organizations report a continued presence of street children selling goods on street corners and rural children working in agriculture to support their families in Tunisia; these children are vulnerable to forced labor or sex trafficking. Tunisian officials reported in 2017 that organized gangs reportedly forced street children to serve as thieves and beggars and transport drugs. Tunisian women are reportedly exploited in sex trafficking under false promises of work both within the country and elsewhere in the region, such as Lebanon, United Arab Emirates, and Jordan. Foreign migrants are particularly vulnerable to sexual exploitation, domestic servitude, and other forms of forced labor in Tunisia. According to an NGO, in 2017 and 2018, foreign trafficking victims typically arrived in Tunisia on a valid tourist or student visa and remained in an exploitative situation for an average of five to 13 months, surpassing the validity of their visa. Civil society and international organizations continue to report an increase in traffickers exploiting women, primarily from West Africa and increasingly from Cote d’Ivoire, in domestic servitude in private homes in Tunis, Sfax, Sousse, and Gabes. An NGO also reported in 2018 that traffickers forced some men from Cote d’Ivoire to work on farms and construction sites. Traffickers reportedly coerce Ivoirians to smuggle cannabis and opioids into Tunisia. According to a Tunisian NGO, recruiters in Cote d’Ivoire target both well-educated and non-skilled individuals in the country with false and fraudulent promises of work in Tunisia. Well-educated Ivoirians, who pay a recruiter to assist them to find work in Tunisia, are promised jobs that do not exist upon arrival in Tunisia, held in debt bondage, and forced into domestic servitude in Tunisian households. Recruiters also target unskilled and uneducated individuals primarily from San Pedro, Cote d’Ivoire, to work in domestic work, construction, or agriculture in Tunisia; these individuals are then required to repay the transportation costs and recruitment fees upon arrival and thereby held in debt bondage by their employers. Civil society organizations continue to report that traffickers appear to coach some of their victims on how to answer questions about their trafficking experiences so that victims can access benefits, such as a reprieve from exit fines, which would further allow the traffickers to exploit their victims. An NGO reported in 2018 a new trend where female victims of domestic servitude and other forms of forced labor, whose employers hold them in debt bondage, are further exploited by nightclub owners that cater to sub-Saharan African communities in Tunisia. The nightclub owners falsely promise to pay the women’s debts in exchange for working in the nightclubs as servers, but the owners subsequently force the women into commercial sex for the nightclubs’ clientele. Civil society organizations also reported in 2018 that male migrants from sub-Saharan Africa who work in poor working conditions could be vulnerable to forced labor. Tunisian LGBTI rights associations reported in 2018 that migrants and asylum-seekers from neighboring countries who escaped violence or discrimination due to their gender identity or sexual orientation may be particularly vulnerable to sex trafficking and forced labor in Tunisia. NGOs and international organizations observed in 2017 a slight increase in boys from Sub-Saharan and West Africa, including Cote d’Ivoire, who were vulnerable to trafficking after accepting fraudulent offers of soccer careers in Tunisia.

TURKEY: TIER 2
The Government of Turkey does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Turkey remained on Tier 2. These efforts included identifying more victims and interviewing more potential victims. The government conducted surveys and consultations to draft a new national action plan and organized robust trainings on various anti-trafficking issues. The government allocated funds for financial assistance to victims, and the national commission and six provincial commissions implemented anti-trafficking efforts. Observers reported the Directorate General for Migration Management (DGMG) improved its ability to accurately identify victims and refer them to assistance. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. Prosecutors and judges lacked experience and resources to prosecute complex cases, and cases were often dropped, acquitted, or reclassified to lesser offenses due to a lack of evidence, particularly testimonies, as victims and witnesses rarely participated in court proceedings. The government provided limited specialized assistance, including victim assistance programs and opportunities to encourage victims to cooperate in investigations. Some domestic civil society groups remained excluded from anti-trafficking efforts. The government, in some cases, penalized victims for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit due to inadequate identification efforts, including limited proactive identification efforts for internal trafficking victims, forced labor victims, and victims among migrants, refugees, and asylum-seekers.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

Vigorously investigate, prosecute, and convict traffickers. • Institutionalize and provide training to investigators, prosecutors, and judges on victim-centered approaches to trafficking cases, including advanced training on trafficking investigations and prosecutions. • Increase proactive victim identification efforts among vulnerable populations, such as refugees and asylum-seekers, persons in LGBTI communities, migrants awaiting deportation, Turkish and foreign women in commercial sex, and children begging in the streets and working in the agricultural and industrial sectors. • Establish procedures or specialized units to ensure trafficking cases are handled by trained prosecutors. • Expand partnerships with civil society to better identify victims and provide victim services. • Strengthen specialized services including shelter and psycho-social support for all victims. • Improve interagency cooperation and adopt a national action plan. • Encourage victims’ participation in investigations and prosecutions, including using remote testimony or funding for travel and other expenses for victims to attend court hearings.

PROSECUTION

The government maintained law enforcement efforts. Article 80 of the penal code criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of eight to 12 years’ imprisonment and a fine equivalent to “10,000 days,” which were sufficiently stringent and, with regard to sex trafficking, commensurate with those for serious crimes, such as rape. The government did not report the number of investigations in 2018 or 2019. The Ministry of Justice (MOJ) prosecuted 52 new trafficking cases with 237 defendants in 2019 (43 new trafficking cases with 198 defendants in the first three quarters of 2018). The MOJ continued to prosecute 192 cases with 1,384 defendants from previous years (172 cases with 1,617 defendants in 2018). Courts convicted 43 traffickers in 2019 (37 traffickers in the first three quarters of 2018); judges sentenced one trafficker with imprisonment, one trafficker with a fine, and 41 traffickers with both imprisonment and fine, but the government did not report the length of the sentences and the amount of the fines. Courts acquitted 258 suspected traffickers (177 suspected traffickers in the first three quarters of 2018).

Turkish National Police (TNP) maintained the Department of Combating Migrant Smuggling and Human Trafficking, comprising 38 officers at headquarters with 22 provincial offices. The Gendarmerie also operated the Department of Counter Smuggling and Trafficking with 16 provincial offices. The government did not designate specialized prosecutors for trafficking cases, and a lack of experience and specialization among prosecutors and judges regarding trafficking, particularly after the dismissal of more than 150,000 government workers during the 2016-2018 state of emergency, limited the judiciary’s ability and means to prosecute complex crimes like trafficking. For example, GRETA reported law enforcement lacked sufficient resources to fully investigate labor trafficking. Experts continued to report misperceptions about trafficking among law enforcement authorities, including confusion between sex trafficking and “encouragement of prostitution” (Article 227) or between labor trafficking and “violation of freedom of work and labor” (Article 117). Judiciary officials reported cases were dropped or reclassified to lesser offenses due to a lack of evidence, particularly testimonies, as victims and witnesses rarely participated in court proceedings. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government employees complicit in trafficking. The government maintained institutionalized training programs for TNP and gendarmerie officers in specialized units but did not provide specialized training for judges and prosecutors. The government, independently and with technical and financial support from international organizations, provided various anti-trafficking training for 3,001 officials, including TNP, coast guard, gendarmerie, prosecutors, and judges. The government did not provide information on extraditions or international investigations.

PROTECTION

The government increased victim protection efforts. DGMM identified 193 victims (134 victims in 2018); 134 were victims of sex trafficking, 35 of labor trafficking, 16 of forced captivity, four of forced begging, three of domestic servitude, and one of child soldiering (95 were victims of sex trafficking and 39 of forced labor in 2018); 173 were female and 20 were male (111 were female and 23 were male in 2018); 20 were children (15 were children in 2018); 191 were foreign victims and two were Turkish nationals (all were foreign victims in 2018). Standard operating procedures provided guidelines for identifying and referring victims to assistance and required first responders to refer potential victims to DGMM, which officially recognized victims. DGMM maintained two identification experts in each of the 81 provincial offices to interview victims; DGMM interviewed approximately 4,500 potential victims (3,612 in 2018). While in previous years, DGMM’s ability to identify victims varied among provinces, and some staff were reluctant to act on cases referred by civil society, an international organization reported improved efforts by DGMM to accurately identify victims and refer them to assistance. The government operated 134 mobile teams for street children in all 81 provinces that conducted outreach work, and the Ministry of Family, Labor, and Social Services (MOFLSS) continued to deploy specialized staff to government-operated migrant and refugee temporary accommodation centers to screen camp residents for indicators of trafficking. However, observers and the government reported the government faced limitations in identifying victims in highly vulnerable refugee and migrant communities outside of camps and had difficulty offering protection resources to address trafficking in these communities. Observers reported the need for improved training for first responders and proactive identification efforts, particularly for forced labor, Turkish nationals, and persons in the LGBTI community. Police reported difficulties in identifying sex trafficking victims due to victims’ fear of deportation, and labor inspectors and asylum officers did not receive training or guidance on victim identification. Additionally, media and civil society reports indicated a small number of forced removals to Syria without screening for indicators of trafficking.

The law entitled officially identified trafficking victims to services, including shelter, medical and psycho-social services, work options, education, translation services, temporary residency, repatriation assistance, financial assistance, vocational training, and legal counseling. The government provided shelter to 43 victims (134 in 2018). The government did not report the total amount allocated for anti-trafficking efforts, compared with 1.05
The government inadequately identified victims, which later resulted in penalizing victims for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit. For example, observers reported authorities arrested, detained, and deported sex trafficking victims and charged potential victims with indicators of trafficking with offenses related to lacking valid documents. The government did not provide guidance on non-penalization of victims to law enforcement authorities. The law entitled identified victims to a temporary residence permit for 30 days, which authorities could extend up to three years with the option to apply for a work permit; the government issued 98 permits (82 in 2018). DGMM voluntarily repatriated 86 victims with support from an international organization (52 in 2018). Judges and prosecutors reported procedural law does not allow victim statements prior to repatriation as evidence in court proceedings. The law provided witness protection and legal aid, but observers reported that limited opportunities to encourage victim cooperation in prosecutions with victim-centered approaches, protection measures, and legal assistance resulted in a high number of acquittals and downgraded cases. The government did not report how many victims participated in criminal investigations or legal procedures. The government maintained judicial interview rooms, which allowed victims to testify in private to reduce re-traumatization. The government also operated a directorate to support victims with psychologists and social workers in seven pilot court houses.

PREVENTION

The government maintained prevention efforts. The government did not update its national action plan, in place since 2009, but conducted surveys and consultations to draft a new plan. A national commission coordinated interagency anti-trafficking efforts and convened in November 2019. Six provincial coordinating commissions for anti-trafficking implemented anti-trafficking efforts at the provincial level. The commission and DGMM continued to publish annual data reports. DGMM maintained a migration-related national hotline that also handled trafficking calls; the government did not report the number of trafficking-related calls to the hotline (258 in 2018). The law required recruitment agencies to maintain a license and approve all contracts with the government; the government adequately enforced the law.

The government continued efforts to identify vulnerable populations and limit trafficking by maintaining comprehensive migrant registration protocols for the nearly four million Syrian and other refugees, including by providing birth registrations for newly born refugee children. The law allowed both Syrians under temporary protection and non-Syrian conditional refugees the right to work, provided they were registered in the province they wished to work in for at least the preceding six months. Applying for a work permit was the responsibility of the employer, and refugee advocates reported the procedure was burdensome and costly, resulting in few employers pursuing that path. As a consequence, the vast majority of both conditional refugees and those under temporary protection largely remained without legal employment options, leaving them vulnerable to exploitation, including trafficking. The government, in collaboration with an international organization and domestic labor unions, implemented various efforts to decrease child labor, including training businesses on regulations for employing children and awareness campaigns. MOFLSS fined 27 workplaces for violating child labor laws (50 in 2018); however, resources and inspections were insufficient to effectively monitor and enforce prohibitions against the use of child labor. In the absence of a complaint, inspectors did not generally visit private agricultural enterprises employing 50 or fewer workers, resulting in enterprises vulnerable to exploitative or forced labor. The government made efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts, including by organizing an awareness campaign.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Turkey, and traffickers exploit victims from Turkey abroad. Trafficking victims in Turkey are primarily from Central and South Asia, Eastern Europe, Azerbaijan, Indonesia, Morocco, and Syria. Of the 134 victims identified in 2019, most were Uzbeks (44), followed by Syrians (31), Moroccans (28), Kyrgyz (26), and Indonesians (11). Traffickers reportedly exploited some Georgian men and women in forced labor and some Turkish men in trafficking and forced labor in Moldova. Romani children from marginalized communities often were seen on the streets in major cities where they worked as garbage collectors, street musicians, and beggars, raising concerns about exploitative conditions and forced labor. Human rights groups reported commercial sexual exploitation remained a problem in the LGBTI community, which faced discrimination and hostility from both authorities and the local population.

The world’s largest refugee population of approximately four million displaced Syrians and more than 350,000 refugees of other nationalities resided in Turkey during the reporting period. Despite government efforts to register refugees and asylum claimants, refugee groups in certain areas remain vulnerable to trafficking and exploitation. Some Syrian and other refugees, including children, are vulnerable to forced or exploitative labor, including street begging. Experts report some refugee children work long hours with low wages, in some cases in substandard conditions. Demographic surveys indicate 50 percent of Syrian women in Turkey are married by age 18. NGOs and others working with refugees have noted that in some cases, Syrians and girls of other nationalities were sold into marriages in which they were vulnerable to domestic servitude and sex trafficking.

Reports indicate some youth in Turkey joined the Kurdistan Workers’ Party (PKK), a U.S.-designated terrorist organization. The government alleged the PKK recruited and forcibly abducted children for conscription, while many in the country’s Kurdish community asserted that youth generally joined the terrorist group voluntarily. Reports document one victim who was forced... to join the group at age 13 and children as young as 11 who were lured by promises of monetary compensation and taken to PKK training camps in Iraq.

TURKMENISTAN: TIER 3

The Government of Turkmenistan does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so; therefore Turkmenistan remained on Tier 3. Despite the lack of significant efforts, the government took some steps to address trafficking, including approving the 2020-2022 national action plan, continuing to participate in anti-trafficking awareness campaigns, working with international organizations on combating trafficking in persons, providing training to its diplomatic corps on human trafficking, identifying potential trafficking victims at the international airport, and continuing to purchase machinery to mechanize cotton harvesting and planting. However, during the reporting period, there was a government policy or pattern of forced labor; the government continued to direct policies that perpetuated the continued mobilization of adult citizens for forced labor in the annual cotton harvest and in public works projects. No officials were held accountable for their role or direct complicity in trafficking crimes and state surveillance practices continued to dissuade any monitoring of the harvest during the reporting period. The government did not report any information on prosecutions and convictions, identified no victims, did not implement legal provisions on victim protection, and did not fund any victim assistance programs.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

Take further action to end government policies or actions that compel forced labor, to include eliminating the quota for cotton, which creates pressure for mobilization of labor. • Grant independent observers full access to monitor cotton cultivation and cease harassment, detention, and abuse of individuals for documenting labor conditions. • Eliminate the practice of requiring fees for replacement pickers or contributions from businesses and entrepreneurs to support the harvest. • Adhere to the 2016 anti-trafficking law and provide victim care services directly or by otherwise funding organizations to do so. • Adopt the national referral mechanism to identify and refer victims to protection services and train police, migration officers, and other relevant officials on such procedures. • While respecting due process, investigate and prosecute suspected sex and labor trafficking offenses under Article 129/1 of the criminal code and convict and punish traffickers. • Hold complicit officials criminally accountable for their involvement in trafficking crimes, including the mobilization of forced labor. • Train police to recognize and investigate sex and labor trafficking crimes. • Expand training for relevant government authorities on implementation of the provisions of the 2016 anti-trafficking law and article 129, as amended in 2016. • Increase awareness of trafficking among the general public through government-run campaigns or financial and in-kind support for NGO-run campaigns.

PROSECUTION

The government maintained minimal anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. Article 129/1 of the criminal code criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of four to 10 years’ imprisonment for offenses involving adult victims, and eight to 15 years’ for offenses involving child victims; these penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape.

The government reported initiating one criminal investigation in Balkan province related to trafficking in persons. The government did not report the number of prosecutions, compared with one case in 2018, and three each in 2017, 2016, and 2015. For the second consecutive year, the government did not report the number of convictions, compared with the conviction of one trafficker in 2017, three in 2016, and nine in 2015. The government reported it trained law enforcement on trafficking prevention; however, it provided no information on the types or number of personnel trained. The government did not provide in-kind support to an international organization for law enforcement training, as it had in prior years. Despite continued reports of widespread corruption, the government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government employees complicit in human trafficking offenses, nor did it report any efforts to end officials’ mobilization of persons for forced labor in the cotton harvest and public works projects. Corruption and official complicity in trafficking crimes remained significant concerns, inhibiting law enforcement action during the year. The government did not report any international investigations or extraditions of suspected traffickers. Independent media and civil society continued to report heightened state security surveillance throughout the 2019 cotton harvest. After serving his full three-year prison sentence, the government released Gaspar Matalaev, a reporter who had been convicted for fraud for his work contributing to an article documenting the use of forced labor in the cotton harvest; a UN working group stated the arrest and detention of Gaspar Matalaev was arbitrary.

PROTECTION

The government maintained negligible protection efforts. The government did not identify any victims in 2019, compared with eight victims in 2018, one victim in 2017, and 11 victims in 2016. An international organization that works closely with the government reported assisting 24 Turkmen victims, including 12 females and 12 males, but estimated the total number of victims was significantly higher, as evidenced by the 8,132 calls to the foreign-funded trafficking hotlines in Ashgabat and Turkmenabat, a 16 percent increase in volume compared with 2018. Despite international organizations utilizing thorough victim identification protocols accepted by the wider international community, the prosecutor general’s office believed most claims were fraudulent. The anti-trafficking law required the provision of a wide range of services from the government to trafficking victims; yet for the fourth consecutive year, the government did not provide comprehensive services to all trafficking victims, nor did it fund international organizations or NGOs to provide such services. An NGO operated one shelter for female and male trafficking victims in Turkmenistan with foreign-donor funding. The shelter provided comprehensive services to five female victims in 2019 (seven females in 2018), including local reintegration and job placement. In partnership with an international organization, the government drafted standard operating procedures for victim identification and referral in 2018. However, the government failed to adopt and implement them, leaving authorities without formal written procedures to identify victims or refer them to care providers. Officials also did not report referring any victims in an ad hoc manner to an international organization for assistance in 2019. Some law enforcement agencies only reported individuals as identified trafficking victims if their cases led to trafficking convictions. The prosecutor general’s office reported victims could apply for physical protection and assistance in obtaining free medical care; however, officials did not provide details of specific cases in which such assistance was provided during the year, and NGOs indicated previously that some victims were required to pay for their own medical treatment.

The anti-trafficking law provided that victims, including those who participate in criminal proceedings, were exempt from administrative or criminal liability for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit and were guaranteed employment. It also required law enforcement agencies to respect the confidentiality of victims. The amended legal code provided for free legal assistance to trafficking victims who applied for official victim status; as the previous year, the government did not report providing any legal assistance to victims. There were no reports of victims seeking or obtaining damages in civil suits. The government made no attempts to identify sex trafficking victims among women arrested for engaging in prostitution. Consequently, officials may have penalized sex trafficking victims for prostitution offenses. After some Turkmen citizens, including trafficking victims, were deported from other countries who had failed to screen them for trafficking indicators, the migration service reportedly blocked them from exiting Turkmenistan for a period of up to five years.

PREVENTION
The government maintained negligible efforts to prevent human trafficking. The government did not have an active national action plan (NAP) for 2019 but reported it collaborated with an international organization to implement its 2016-2018 NAP. In December 2019, the government, with assistance from an international organization, approved its 2020-2022 NAP; the government did not allocate financial resources to implement the plan but provided some in-kind contributions. The government did not take any steps to eliminate state policies that perpetuated government-compelled forced labor during the cotton harvest or in public works projects. The government reported it purchased cotton picking and planting machinery in an effort to mechanize the harvest to reduce dependency on human labor; however, the government did not report the implementation and effectiveness of the machinery and, due to a lack of independent observation, the impacts of mechanization were unknown. Despite the absence of formal observation by international organizations, informal observers have noted a visible decline in recent years of forced labor in cotton harvesting and sowing, likely due to mechanization, the availability of low-wage labor, and possibly other factors. Independent media and civil society continued to report local government officials in some areas required public sector workers pay for a replacement picker through an unregulated, informal system, creating a penalty for not participating in the forced labor system and a means of extortion for corrupt officials. Informal observation suggested forced child labor in the harvesting and sowing of cotton seemed to be minimal or non-existent.

The 2016 anti-trafficking law assigned responsibilities for anti-trafficking efforts among government agencies and charged the cabinet of ministers with planning, funding, and implementing anti-trafficking policy. It also called for the creation of an interagency anti-trafficking committee, comprising several cabinet-level agencies and under the authority of the cabinet of ministers, to coordinate, plan, monitor, and report on the government’s anti-trafficking efforts and analyze trends, improve victim protection measures, raise awareness, and monitor implementation of the NAP. The government established the interagency anti-trafficking committee in 2019; an international organization assisted convening the group. The law required the Ministry of Internal Affairs to record data on trafficking crimes; however, for the fourth year, the government did not report any systematic efforts to monitor its anti-trafficking efforts and did not make publicly available government data on the incidence of trafficking and trafficking-related prosecutions and convictions. The government cooperated with NGOs to conduct awareness campaigns in rural areas targeting vulnerable populations. The campaigns included trainings, information sessions, workshops, round tables, movie demonstrations, and school discussions. According to civil society, the government charged NGOs fees to place anti-trafficking awareness material in a government-owned public space. The government did not have procedures to regulate labor recruiters and did not report efforts to punish labor recruiters or brokers involved in the fraudulent recruitment of workers. The stateless population in Turkmenistan, mostly consisting of former Soviet citizens, was vulnerable to trafficking; in 2019, the government granted citizenship to 863 stateless persons permanently living in Turkmenistan, compared with 735 persons in 2018. State migration officials routinely prevented individuals from departing the country by stopping them at the Ashgabat airports; anecdotal evidence suggests thousands of people were prevented from exiting Turkmenistan in 2019. The government reported that it restricted the travel of young women in particular as a preventative measure against being exploited by traffickers abroad. The government, in partnership with an international organization, provided anti-trafficking trainings to its diplomatic personnel. The government made efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts by criminalizing the purchase of commercial sex.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic victims in Turkmenistan, and traffickers exploit victims from Turkmenistan abroad. State policies continued to perpetuate government-compelled forced labor; in 2016, an ILO Committee of Experts’ report noted “with deep concern the widespread use of forced labor in cotton production,” and in its 2020 report expressed “concern at the continued practice of forced labor in the cotton sector.” To meet government-imposed quotas for the cotton harvest, government officials required some employees at private-sector institutions, soldiers, and public sector workers (including teachers, doctors, nurses, and others) to pick cotton without payment and under the threat of penalty, such as dismissal, reduced work hours, or salary deductions. Reports of local officials coercing public sector workers to pay for replacement pickers through an unregulated, informal system remained. Authorities threatened farmers with loss of land if they did not meet government-imposed quotas. In addition, the government compulsorily mobilized students, teachers, doctors, and other civil servants for public works projects, such as planting trees and cleaning streets and public spaces in advance of presidential visits. Public servants and students have also been forced to serve in support roles during government-sponsored events, such as the 2018 World Weightlifting Championship, without receiving compensation. Workers in the construction sector are vulnerable to forced labor. Turkmen men and women are subjected to forced labor after migrating abroad for employment in the textile, agricultural, construction, and domestic service sectors. Sex traffickers exploit Turkmen women abroad. Turkey, Russia, and India are the most frequent destinations of Turkmen victims, followed by other countries in the Middle East, South and Central Asia, and Europe. The government routinely denies freedom of movement to citizens attempting to leave the country, which leaves Turkmen vulnerable to trafficking while attempting to leave Turkmenistan through unofficial channels. Residents of rural areas in Turkmenistan are most at risk of becoming trafficking victims, both within the country and abroad.
The Government of Uganda does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. These efforts included investigating allegations of complicit officials, implementing the protection and prevention provisions of the 2009 anti-trafficking act, increasing convictions for alleged traffickers, and announcing plans to create an anti-trafficking department within the police force. However, the government did not demonstrate overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period. The government reported the lowest number of investigations in the past five years and reported a substantial decrease in prosecutions. The government did not report training law enforcement and immigration officials compared with doing so during the previous four reporting periods. The government identified and referred significantly fewer victims compared with previous reporting periods. The government severely underfunded The Coordination Office for Prevention of Trafficking in Persons (COPTIP) which inhibited efforts to coordinate and combat trafficking nationally. The government did not employ systematic procedures to refer or assist victims and did not allocate resources to NGOs that provide protective services. Therefore Uganda was downgraded to Tier 2 Watch List.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Finalize and approve a formal national mechanism to systematically identify and refer trafficking victims to appropriate care. • Expand protective services for victims through partnerships with NGOs, including by allocating resources. • Increase efforts to investigate trafficking cases and prosecute alleged traffickers, including allegations of official complicity in trafficking crimes and prosecute and convict complicit officials. • Increase training for Ugandan embassy staff on assisting trafficking victims abroad, including victim identification, providing temporary shelter or identifying local NGO shelters for victim referral, and facilitating the repatriation of victims. • Where feasible, assign labor attachés to Ugandan embassies. • Further prioritize investigating and prosecuting traffickers who exploit children, especially from the Karamoja region, in forced begging and child sex trafficking in brothels. • Implement strong regulations and oversight of recruitment companies, and improve enforcement, including by continuing to prosecute those involved in fraudulent labor recruitment. • Increase bilateral negotiations with destination country governments on migrant worker rights, including on the release and repatriation of Ugandan migrant workers exploited by employers abroad, and on mutually enforceable standard contracts. • Implement and monitor the stipulations of the bilateral labor agreements already in place. • Actively investigate and punish labor recruiters who fraudulently recruit Ugandans and eliminate all worker-paid recruitment fees. • Increase resources dedicated to anti-trafficking efforts. • Establish a unified system of documenting and collecting data on human trafficking cases. • Enact witness protection legislation and implement a systematic victim-witness support program. • Increase national awareness raising efforts, specifically to teachers, parents, and community leaders. • Increase quality of trafficking investigations and improve coordination between law enforcement and prosecutors, including conducting prosecution-led investigations and systematic case referral to the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions. • Accede to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol.

PROSECUTION
The government maintained mixed law enforcement efforts. The 2009 anti-trafficking act criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed punishments of up to 15 years’ imprisonment for offenses involving adult victims and up to life imprisonment for those involving child victims. These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as kidnapping. The law also criminalized the use of a child in any armed conflict and prescribed penalties of up to the death penalty. The Children Amendment Act of 2016 conflicted with the 2009 anti-trafficking act in some respects—for example, it defined child sex trafficking to require force, fraud, or coercion, which was inconsistent with the definition of trafficking under international law, and it prescribed substantially lower penalties for the crime.

In 2019, the government reported investigating 120 suspected trafficking cases—30 domestic and 90 transnational cases; this was a decrease compared with investigating 286 cases in 2018. The government prosecuted 50 suspected trafficking cases for trafficking-related crimes; compared with 63 cases in 2018. Courts convicted 15 traffickers in 2019, an increase compared with six traffickers convicted in 2018. Officers focusing on trafficking previously operated under the Criminal Investigation and Crime Intelligence Department; however, in July 2019, the Uganda Police Force (UPF) announced the formation of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Department. The government reported the new department will have approximately 250 officers across the country working on anti-trafficking efforts, including at border posts, and will be headed by the Deputy Assistant Superintendent of Police. Corruption and official complicity in trafficking crimes remained significant concerns, inhibiting law enforcement action during the year. In August 2019, the State House Anti-Corruption Unit launched an investigation following complaints of government officials’ involvement in trafficking; however, the government did not publish any reports nor did it arrest any officials by the end of the reporting period. In 2018, the government reported investigating security officers at Malaba Border and Entebbe Airport, as well as officials of the Civil Aviation Authority and Ground Handling Companies at Entebbe Airport, for alleged involvement in trafficking crimes, but it did not report any updates on these cases. The government did not report initiating investigations into media allegations from the previous reporting period that police officers were complicit in sex trafficking of child and female refugees. Additionally, the media and the senior government officials reported some of the labor recruitment companies suspected of involvement in trafficking were associated with, or partially owned by, high-level officials, which impeded law enforcement agencies’ ability to investigate their operations. An NGO continued to report that some complicit immigration officers at border crossings facilitated passage of trafficking victims, and several NGOs alleged that some senior police officials in Kampala protected traffickers from arrest and prosecution. The government did not report progress on prosecution of a case from 2014 involving the former Commissioner from the Ministry of Finance charged with child trafficking; the former Commissioner absconded and the government issued a warrant for his arrest.

The government maintained a trafficking-specific desk in the Director of Public Prosecutions’ (DPP) office responsible for prosecuting trafficking crimes. The government did not report training front-line officials on anti-trafficking in 2019, compared with reporting training to 303 front-line officials on the anti-trafficking act and other laws related to illegal labor recruitment and training immigration officials on investigations and prosecutions during the previous reporting period. COPTIP reported that the training curriculum for both new and experienced police and immigration officers incorporated modules on human trafficking; however, the government did not report how many officials received the training during the reporting period. In February 2020, an NGO trained 31 police officers; officers selected represented regions throughout the country, including border posts. Contrary to 2018, when the government provided training on victim identification to 25 South Sudanese immigration officials, the government did not provide training to foreign officials in 2019. Ugandan police and immigration officers continued to lack an understanding of the anti-trafficking law and may have misclassified cases or encouraged victims to accept financial compensation from traffickers in exchange for dropping their cases. Law enforcement officials did not always coordinate with the DPP, frequently resulting in cases that did not proceed to prosecution or courts dismissed, because the investigations were incomplete and did not comply with protocols for admissible evidence. In January 2020, 200 Ugandan and Kenyan officers jointly identified and referred 96 Ugandan female victims in Nairobi, including 41 minors as young as 14 and as old as 18, and separately on the same day intercepted 96 Ugandan victims at Jomo Kenyatta International Airport in Kenya as they prepared to board a flight to the United Arab Emirates (UAE). This operation resulted in the largest number of trafficking victims assisted at one time since the governments of Kenya and Uganda commenced cooperation efforts. The DPP initiated information and evidence sharing with foreign officials from the Government of Malaysia for an ongoing prosecution case in Uganda, but it did not provide further details.

PROTECTION

The government decreased protection. While the government drafted national victim identification and referral procedures, it had not finalized or approved them by the end of the reporting period. The government identified 455 victims—71 domestic and 384 transnational—in 2019, compared with identifying 650 victims in 2018. A majority of the domestic victims identified were teenage girls while the majority of transnational victims identified were women; most identified victims were subjected to forced labor. According to the government, authorities intercepted 2,334 Ugandan potential victims attempting to depart to countries officials had assessed as high risk for trafficking or for which travelers were unable to adequately explain the purpose of their travel. However, the government did not report if those individuals were identified as victims, referred to assistance, or received proper services, compared with 599 intercepted during the previous reporting period.

The Minister of Justice approved and published the implementing regulations for the 2009 anti-trafficking act during the last reporting period; these regulations outlined responsibilities for relevant stakeholders including law enforcement, medical professionals, and civil society members to combat trafficking and went into effect in March 2020. The government did not track or report how many victims it referred to care or directly assisted. It continued to collaborate on NGOs and international organizations to provide the vast majority of victim services via referrals to NGO-operated shelters, which provided psychological counseling, medical treatment, family tracing, resettlement support, and vocational education without contributing in-kind or financial support. Victim care, although high quality, remained inadequate in quantity, and available services were primarily for children and women, with few NGOs offering shelter for adult males. The government reported continuing to fund the resettlement of street children identified by officials. The government reported training law enforcement and police officers on how to conduct child-friendly rescues of children from the street. In previous years, child victims in need of immediate shelter often stayed at police stations, sometimes sleeping in impounded vehicles, or at a juvenile detention center while awaiting placement in more formal shelters. In 2019, foreign governments identified 2,384 Ugandan victims abroad. The government assisted in the facilitation of repatriating 170 of those victims back to Uganda.

The lack of embassies in many destination countries hindered repatriation efforts of Ugandan victims abroad. Where embassies existed, they often lacked the capacity to provide adequate assistance for Ugandan nationals abroad. The government provided replacement travel documents to facilitate the repatriation of its citizens and ad hoc assistance including shelter and food in embassies; however, some trafficking victims continued to allege officials denied them temporary travel documents in order to return to Uganda. NGOs provided funding for return travel. The government continued to implement its agreement with the Government of Kenya to share information on traffickers and facilitate the repatriation of potential trafficking victims; however, the government did not report the number of potential victims that were repatriated during the reporting period, compared with 63 in 2018. Ugandan victims are also able to access shelter at Kenyan embassies abroad. The government did not report if it continued to use a temporary shelter in UAE and an emergency fund in Saudi Arabia for distressed Ugandan nationals, including trafficking victims. In response to the continued abuse of migrant workers’ rights abroad, the Uganda Association of External Recruitment Agencies, a private sector entity, continued to employ a labor liaison office in Saudi Arabia during the reporting period; however, because the duties of a labor attaché are traditionally addressed by governments where victim identification and assistance is the priority, some civil society members expressed concern about possible conflicts of interest since this organization represented private businesses.

Judicial officers often encouraged trafficking victims to participate in the investigation and prosecution of their traffickers to prevent the victimization of others, but some reports indicated that law enforcement’s limited capacity and inadequate sensitivity in engaging trafficking victims discouraged many from cooperating in investigations. The absence of victim-witness protection legislation and a protection program hindered some investigations and prosecutions because perpetrators would threaten and blackmail victims and witnesses to discourage their participation in trials. There was no formal policy to provide cooperating victims and witnesses with assistance, support, or safety in a systematic way. Generally, in high court cases, victims and witnesses were provided with transportation, physical protection, shelter, interpretation services, and legal counsel, but it was ad hoc and inconsistent. Some reports indicated that police would temporarily shelter cooperating victims in their homes. Ugandan law permitted foreign trafficking victims to remain in Uganda during the investigation of their cases and to apply for residence and work permits, but the government did not report granting any victims such benefits during the reporting period. The law permitted victims to keep their identities anonymous by using voice distortion and video link facilities, but the practice had not yet been implemented. The law allowed victims to file civil suits against the government or their alleged traffickers for compensation, which two victims utilized during the reporting period.

While the 2009 anti-trafficking act prohibits the penalization of trafficking victims for unlawful acts their traffickers coerced them to commit, reports from prior years indicated the government detained and placed on bond some trafficking victims, including children, in an attempt to compel them to cooperate with and periodically report to law enforcement in support of criminal the joint implementation committees needed to implement and Social Development (MGLSD) encouraged Ugandan workers in the Middle East and other regions. The Ministry of Gender Labor and Developmental countries in which labor ministers discussed the harmonization of labor agreements with Jordan, and Saudi Arabia did not adequately protect Uganda workers. In January 2020, the government signed a labor agreement with the UAE in June due to ongoing reports of abuse and trafficking. While Immigration officials continued to scrutinize travel documents, and reasons for travel before clearing travelers to ensure they could repatriate workers. The government reported vetting all labor requests received by local companies and all contracts executed between international employers and the Ugandan business. The government continued its oversight of labor recruitment agencies and reported investigating labor companies following complaints including fraud and companies charging high administrative fees. The government made three arrests from the complaints and charged the perpetrators with trafficking, compared with investigating individuals and companies for trafficking-related and illegal recruitment offenses and prosecuting 76 individuals in 2018. Corruption, insufficient staffing and funding, and loopholes in law reportedly inhibited oversight of labor recruitment firms. Previously, the government reported unlicensed labor recruitment companies were responsible for trafficking more than 90 percent of the registered victims, although licensed labor recruitment companies were reportedly involved at times. The government allowed legal placement fees of 50,000 UGX ($13.70). On February 4, 2020, the government announced all labor export companies must refund any fees in excess of this amount by February 17, 2020. On February 28, 2020, the government suspended the licenses of six labor export companies for charging potential workers illegal registration and placement fees, compared with canceling the licenses of three companies and suspending seven in 2018. MGLSD contracted private companies to conduct mandatory pre-departure training for domestic workers who were traveling to the Middle East and utilizing registered labor recruitment companies. The weekend residential trainings, paid for by the recruitment company and usually taken by 60-70 women each week, included training on domestic work, contract appreciation, understanding of the bilateral agreements, how to contact help, and the rights of the worker. The government conducted announced child-labor inspections in three gold mines—a sector in which forced labor occurs—to mark World Day Against Child Labor 2019; however, due to limited funds, enforcement agencies only carried out inspections after receiving complaints. As mandated by the 2015 Registration of Persons Act, the government continued to register its citizens and provide them with national identification numbers. The government continued to provide anti-trafficking training to some of its diplomatic personnel and provided guidance in the form of handbooks to the rest. The government provided anti-trafficking training to Uganda’s troops prior to their deployment abroad as part of international peacekeeping missions. The government did not make discernible efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. Uganda is not a party to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Uganda, and traffickers exploit victims from Uganda abroad. Ugandan children as young as 7 years old are exploited in forced labor in agriculture, fishing, forestry, cattle herding, mining, stone quarrying, brick making, carpentry, steel manufacturing, street vending, bars, restaurants, gold mining, and domestic service. Traffickers exploit girls and boys in commercial sex. Recruiters target girls and women aged 13-24 for domestic sex trafficking, especially near sports tournaments and road construction projects. An international organization estimates there are between 7,000 to 12,000 children exploited in sex trafficking in Uganda. An international organization and NGO reported that most internal trafficking victims are Ugandans.
many of whom are from the northeastern region, specifically Karamojong children whom traffickers exploit in forced begging and commercial sex in brothels. In February 2020, the government and civil society reported children from Karamoja were sold at markets in the eastern region for 20,000-50,000 UGX ($5.46-$13.70); traffickers exploited them in forced labor as beggars, domestic workers, and in commercial sex. An NGO reported local authorities’ intervention to remove internally trafficked children from the streets caused children to move to work as vendors in markets where they are vulnerable to exploitation. Researchers reported there are approximately 3,800 children living on the streets of Kampala and three other major towns and an additional 11,700 children working on the streets but sleeping elsewhere. Reportedly, traffickers, called “elders,” force some street children to beg and exploit the girls in commercial sex. The “elders” are a well-organized network of traffickers and NGOs have alleged complicit officials allow the practice to continue. A local organization reported parents in the Acholi subregion in northern Uganda, who failed to pay their debts were required to have their children work on farms until the debt was paid. In 2018, an NGO alleged that traffickers recruited children from Napak district, northeastern Uganda, and then sold them as domestic workers for 20,000 UGX ($5.46). Media reported that some parents sell their children to middlemen who resell the children for approximately 30,000 UGX ($8.20). In 2018, an international organization reported separating four Ugandan children from armed groups in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC). Authorities subjected some prisoners in pre-trial detention to forced labor.

Traffickers compel some children from the DRC, Rwanda, Burundi, Kenya, Tanzania, and South Sudan into forced agricultural labor and sex trafficking in Uganda. In 2017, individuals from Rwanda and Somalia, including a Somali refugee from Nakivale Refugee Settlement, were victims of internal trafficking. South Sudanese children in refugee settlements in northern Uganda are at risk of trafficking. In 2018, there were several media reports of alleged complicity of police officers in the sex trafficking of child and female refugees.

Young women remained the most at risk for transnational trafficking, usually seeking employment as domestic workers in the Middle East; at times traffickers fraudulently recruited Ugandan women for employment and then exploited them in sex trafficking. Traffickers subject Ugandans to forced labor and sex trafficking in UAE, Saudi Arabia, Oman, Qatar, Kuwait, Iraq, Iran, Egypt, Turkey, Algeria, Malaysia, Thailand, Bahrain, Jordan, China, and Kenya; India has increasingly become a destination for sex trafficking. In 2019, media reported traffickers sold girls from markets in Katakwi district and transported the girls to Nairobi where they were exploited as domestic workers; some of the girls worked for Somali immigrants in Nairobi and were further transported to Somalia where they were exploited by al-Shabaab terrorist group. In 2018, media and government officials alleged Ugandan girls were being sold in a “slave market” in the UAE. Extremely high recruitment fees sometimes led to situations of debt bondage. To circumvent the government ban on migrant work in Oman, some licensed and unlicensed agencies send Ugandans through Kenya and Tanzania. Official complicity may have hindered government oversight of labor recruitment agencies. COPTIP reported that traffickers appear to be increasingly organized and some may have formed regional trafficking networks. The government and an NGO reported an increase in victims with university degrees as traffickers target graduates with the promise of skilled jobs abroad. The government and NGOs reported cases involving victims that were recruited by licensed companies in which victims paid high administrative fees based on promised high-paid jobs abroad; however, upon arrival, they found themselves locked into contracts in low-paid domestic work. NGOs reported that traffickers are frequently relatives or friends of victims, or may pose as wealthy women or labor recruiters promising vulnerable Ugandans, frequently from rural areas, well-paid jobs abroad or in Uganda’s metropolitan areas. Reportedly, pastors, imams, and local leaders at churches and mosques in Uganda have also assisted in the recruitment of domestic workers abroad, mostly for Middle Eastern countries; these leaders encourage female domestic workers to take these jobs and in turn receive a fee per worker from recruiters. Some traffickers threatened to harm the victims’ family or confiscated travel documents.

UKRAINE: TIER 2

The Government of Ukraine does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Ukraine remained on Tier 2. These efforts included increasing investigations, more than doubling the number of traffickers convicted, investigating more cases of forced labor, proposing draft legislation to elimination recruitment fees, and granting official status to more victims who were incarcerated abroad for crimes their traffickers compelled them to commit. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. Courts were slow to review cases, aggravated by chronic understaffing, and issued many suspended sentences, likely aggravated by corruption, resulting in the majority of convicted traffickers avoiding imprisonment. This effort was inadequate to deter trafficking. The moratorium on labor inspections continued to hamper law enforcement investigations on labor trafficking cases. Reports of officials, including senior anti-trafficking police officials, complicit in human trafficking persisted; the government initiated criminal investigations and prosecutions of several allegedly complicit officials during the reporting period but had not secured any convictions. The government certified fewer victims in 2019; international organizations continued to identify far more victims than the government, indicating the government’s inadequate identification efforts and a continuing lack of trust in the government’s ability to protect victims.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

Punish convicted traffickers with significant prison terms. • Clearly define administrative chains of responsibility and competencies of service providers throughout the decentralization process to minimize disruption in the processes of identification, referral, and assistance to trafficking victims. • Vigorously investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes, including public officials complicit in trafficking crimes. • Identify and certify the status of more victims to ensure they are afforded their rights under the trafficking law and modify the procedure for granting victim status to lessen the burden on victims to self-identify and divulge sensitive information. • Increase law enforcement investigations of recruitment firms engaged in fraudulent practices and end the moratorium on random labor inspections. • Increase training for law enforcement, prosecutors, and judges in the investigation and prosecution of trafficking cases, particularly on forced labor, a victims' testimony. • Undertake a systemic effort to implement victim-witness protection measures and take active measures to prevent intimidation of victims during legal procedures. • Increase training for officials on victim identification, particularly in proactive screening for labor trafficking and of vulnerable populations, such as women in commercial sex, children in sex trafficking, foreign migrant workers, and internally displaced persons. • Enact legislation to strengthen protections for foreign victims. • Establish a dedicated, independent counter-trafficking coordinator position with support staff.

PROSECUTION
The government increased law enforcement efforts. Article 149 criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of three to eight years’ imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Law enforcement investigated 297 trafficking offenses in 2019, compared with 275 in 2018. These included 135 instances of labor trafficking, 112 for sex trafficking, 47 for forced involvement in criminal activity, and three for forced begging. Authorities continued to report investigations and arrests of multiple organized crime groups facilitating forced labor and sexual exploitation in Ukraine and abroad. Law enforcement referred 233 notices of suspicion, a necessary precursor to a court trial, involving 120 suspects in 2019, compared with 195 cases involving 133 suspects in 2018. Prosecutors pursued 201 of these referrals in court, compared with 148 in 2018, and moved 199 prosecutions of cases past the indictment stage in court in 2019, compared with 68 cases in 2018. Eighty-five cases from 2019 remained ongoing in the courts, compared to 55 in 2018. The government reached final judgment on 40 cases and convicted 35 traffickers in 2019 under Article 149, an increase from 15 traffickers in 2018. Of the 35 convicted traffickers sentenced in 2019, only 13 (37 percent) received prison sentences, which ranged from two to 10 years; the government confiscated assets from one defendant, while the remaining convicted traffickers received suspended sentences or were freed from serving their sentences under leniency provisions. Authorities collaborated with foreign governments on multiple transnational investigations and nine extraditions, including Russia, Moldova, Belgium, the United States, and other European and Asian countries.

Institutional reforms over the past five years—in addition to parliamentary and presidential elections in 2019—led to widespread turnover in many government institutions, notably within the ranks of the national police and the judiciary. The process of court reorganization changed some court jurisdictions, which risked the lengthening of the judicial process for cases that were reassigned to new panels. The recertification and restructuring of police units continued, which helped reduce the number of officers suspected of corruption and included mandatory training and testing on trafficking with assistance from an international organization. Despite overall improvements, challenges resulting from structural reforms and personnel changes hampered efforts at the local level. The government, in conjunction with international funding and partners, continued training for judges, prosecutors, law enforcement, and other officials. The Office of the Prosecutor General and National Police added anti-trafficking to their professional education curricula, and State Border Guard Service offered a new online distance-learning course to its staff. Officials also participated in international training and anti-trafficking fora throughout the year.

Endemic corruption plagued the police and judiciary, and cases of officials complicit in human trafficking persisted. The government continued to report investigations of officials allegedly complicit in trafficking; however, there were no new convictions. For instance, in December 2019, the government issued notices of suspicion to the deputy commanders of the National Police and Kyiv City counter-trafficking unit for allegedly covering up unlawful brothel activities in exchange for bribes; both were suspended from official duties pending criminal investigation. The National Police also opened forced labor investigations against managers of a state orphanage in Zakarpattya suspected of exploiting children and against staff of a state-run shelter for persons with disabilities in Zaporiizhzhya. Other high-profile cases remained pending with the court for years, including the former commander of the Kyiv City police counter-trafficking unit, three police officers, recruiters for trafficking Ukrainians into a drug-trafficking ring in Russia, and a teacher at a government-run boarding school for orphans in Kharkiv who attempted to sell one of her students.

PROTECTION
The government decreased efforts in some areas of protection. In October 2019, Parliament did not pass draft legislation introduced in 2017 intended to increase the safety of persons with disabilities from exploitation, improve procedures for establishing victim status, expand the network of victim service providers, and improve protections for foreign victims and stateless persons. The police identified 262 victims in 2019, compared with 275 in 2018 and 349 in 2017; 145 victims were male, 107 female, and 10 children. Authorities approved 185 of 283 applications requesting official victim status, compared with 214 of 266 in 2018 and 195 of 273 in 2017. The majority of victims were Ukrainians exploited abroad; only one domestically identified victim was foreign. The government continued to use a simplified application process for potential victims incarcerated abroad, which included waiving the in-person interview requirement; the government granted official victim status to 40 individuals incarcerated abroad in 2019, compared with 28 in 2018. Civil society reported the government rejected more applications in 2019 due to stricter internal procedures to classify cases as trafficking crimes or prove exploitation under non-trafficking articles as well as large-scale personnel turnover within the office that approved the applications. Authorities did not approve 72 applications reported due to police not qualifying the crime as trafficking and returned 10 applications for additional information; the reason(s) for rejection of the other 16 applications remained unknown. The government continued to rely on international organizations and NGOs, with international donor funding, to identify victims and provide the vast majority of victim protection and assistance. According to an international organization, the national referral mechanism did not formalize a process for NGOs to access state funding. An international organization in Ukraine assisted 1,345 victims, compared with 1,265 in 2018. International organizations reported the majority of their identified victims were exploited by labor traffickers; the government reported identifying an increased number of victims subjected to labor trafficking in 2019. Victims not requiring specialized services may have chosen not to pursue official victim status, although NGOs reported the emphasis on documents deterred some labor victims and members of the Romani community from applying. The government cooperated with NGOs on victim identification through the national referral mechanism. Changes in administration, personnel turnover, and ongoing decentralization reforms continued to obscure local communities’ chains of responsibility for decisions regarding provision of key social services, including identifying, referring, and assisting trafficking victims; however, NGOs continued to report the strengthening of local self-governance expanded local decision-making powers and secured more solid financing over the reporting period.

The government allocated 548,000 hryvnia ($23,130) to the national budget for anti-trafficking measures in 2019, compared with the same amount in 2018 and disbursements of 98,800 hryvnia ($4,170) in 2017. For the past four years, funding for local budgets remained the same at 219,220 ($9,250) hryvnia. The government increased financial assistance to each officially recognized victim in amounts greater than the official subsistence level. Ukraine’s trafficking law entitled victims to housing at a government shelter, psychological assistance, medical services, employment counseling, and vocational training, regardless of whether a criminal case proceeded or the victim cooperated with law enforcement. Authorities assigned victims with official status a case management team, which provided referrals to care facilities, NGOs, or other services according to an individualized plan. Some victims requiring shelter stayed at a rehabilitation center run by an international organization. The center received funding from international donors and was housed in a state-run hospital. Adult victims could also stay at government-run centers for socio-psychological assistance for up to 90 days and receive psychological and medical support, lodging, food, and legal assistance. Authorities could accommodate child victims in centers for socio-psychological rehabilitation of children for up to 12 months and administer social, medical, psychological, education, legal, and other types of assistance. The government maintained 21 centers for socio-psychological assistance, 24 shelters for domestic violence opened to trafficking victims, as well as 692 social services centers. The government reported it implemented a family-based approach, opening services to victims’ families as needed; 157 families received psychological services, 114 received legal assistance, 34 received medical assistance, and 18 families received housing assistance. Despite a continued pledge, the government did not provide funding or resources to an international organization’s victim rehabilitation center. Observers reported the provision of assistance was problematic due to funding shortfalls and a lack of coordination between state bodies at the regional level. The government, often in cooperation with international organizations, provided training for officials on victim identification and assistance. The government reported it assisted the repatriation of one Ukrainian victim from Thailand.

The Witness Protection Law provided protections for victims, but courts rarely utilized any protection measures in practice. Victims commonly suffered threats and intimidation throughout the legal process. NGOs reported the release of alleged traffickers on bail increased the risk to victims; in some cases, alleged traffickers lived in the same community as their victims. However, the government did not report whether it provided any victims with witness protection or protective measures inside courtrooms. NGOs reported the government often did not provide legal assistance or other support to victims during criminal cases. The government did not report cases of courts ordering restitution payments for victims in 2019.

Officials reported screening illegal migrants for indicators of trafficking and identified one foreign victim in 2019; international organizations did not report identifying any foreign victims in 2019. Foreign victims were entitled to the same benefits as Ukrainian citizens and had additional access to interpretation services, temporary legal stay, and voluntary repatriation. There was no legal way for foreign victims who remained in Ukraine less than three years to extend their stay, change legal residency, secure employment rights, or seek protection from deportation to countries where they would face hardship or retribution.

PREVENTION
The government maintained prevention efforts. The Ministry for Social Policy (MSP) continued to coordinate anti-trafficking efforts at the national and local levels, but restructuring and staffing gaps continued to limit its activities. These gaps were due to sweeping personnel changes because of a new presidential administration. The government maintained a 2016-2020 national action plan. MSP published a report on the implementation of the government’s anti-trafficking policies for the first half of 2019. In December 2019, the Cabinet of Ministers issued a decree to establish a pilot hotline for trafficking, domestic or gender-based violence, and child abuse. A counter trafficking and migrant advice hotline was operated by a local NGO and funded by international donors. In 2019, the hotline received 22,053 calls, compared with 20,425 in 2018; 83 potential victims were identified and referred to responsible local agencies and NGOs for assistance. Authorities, in coordination with NGOs, international organizations, and local partners, continued to conduct a wide range of awareness campaigns throughout the country, including television and movie programs, street advertising, public events, and community policing. MSP, in coordination with an international organization, conducted multi-site awareness events on Child Protection Day and World Day Against Trafficking in Persons.

Police continued to monitor and investigate formal and informal recruitment networks, including companies advertising jobs abroad, and participated with other stakeholders to raise awareness about known recruitment schemes. The MSP continued to maintain a list of licensed recruitment companies; in December 2019, licensing responsibility was transferred to the Ministry of Economic Development. In October 2019, parliament introduced a draft law that banned recruitment companies from charging fees to citizens seeking employment abroad. The government hired 190 additional labor inspectors; however, it extended a moratorium on random labor inspections throughout 2019. The government allowed inspections when credible information of trafficking existed; however, observers reported the number of inspectors, inspections, and resources dedicated to overseeing labor laws and monitoring recruitment agencies’ compliance remained inadequate, and a lack of training hampered inspectors’ ability to identify trafficking victims. The government did not demonstrate efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. The government, with assistance from an international organization, continued to provide victim identification and referral training to diplomats.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human trafficking of domestic and foreign victims occurs in Ukraine, and human trafficking of victims from Ukraine takes place abroad. Ukrainian victims are exploited in sex trafficking and forced labor in Ukraine as well as in Russia, Poland, Germany, and other parts of Europe, People’s Republic of China, Kazakhstan, and the Middle East. Some Ukrainian children and vulnerable adults are exploited via forced begging. Traffickers target persons from the Roma community, due in part to their lack of access to state social assistance programs. A small number of foreign nationals are exploited in forced labor in Ukraine. A growing number of forced labor victims in Ukraine and abroad are exploited in a variety of sectors, including construction, agriculture, manufacturing, domestic work, the lumber industry, nursing, and street begging. The number of foreign victims in Ukraine has fallen dramatically since the beginning of hostilities in eastern Ukraine, although smuggled migrants transiting Ukraine are vulnerable to trafficking. Increasingly, low-skilled laborers remain vulnerable to labor exploitation. Traffickers target low-skilled workers transiting Ukraine. The approximately 104,000 children institutionalized in state-run orphanages are at especially high risk of trafficking. Officials of several state-run residential institutions and orphanages were allegedly complicit or willfully negligent in the sex and labor trafficking of girls and boys under their care.

Fueled by Russian aggression, the conflict in eastern Ukraine and Russia’s occupation of Crimea has displaced more than three million people, and this population is especially vulnerable to human trafficking throughout the country. In areas of eastern Ukraine controlled by Russia-led forces, employment options are limited and Russia’s proxy “authorities” place restrictions on international humanitarian aid intended to help meet civilian needs. Traffickers reportedly kidnap women and girls from conflict-affected areas for sex and labor trafficking in Ukraine and Russia. Traffickers targeted internally displaced persons and subjected some Ukrainians to forced labor on territory not under government control, often via kidnapping, torture, and extortion. International organizations reported the demographics of Ukrainian trafficking victims has shifted since the beginning of the conflict to include more urban, younger, and male victims exploited increasingly in forced labor and criminality, such as drug trafficking and couriers.

Uncorroborated reports of Russia-led forces using children as soldiers, informants, and human shields continued, but the number of such reports has decreased since the early years of the conflict. Then, Russian backed forces in territories not controlled by the Ukrainian government reportedly used children to take direct and indirect part in the armed conflict to perform armed duty at checkpoints, as fighters, and served as guards, mailpersons, and secretaries. The recruitment of children by militant groups took place in territory not under the control of the government and in areas where the government was unable to enforce national prohibitions against the use of children in armed conflict.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES: TIER 2

The Government of the United Arab Emirates (UAE) does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore the UAE remained on Tier 2. These efforts included increasing the number of sex trafficking prosecutions and doubling the number of sex trafficking convictions. Officials launched robust awareness campaigns in strategic locations, which reached a substantial number of vulnerable populations, expatriates, and government stakeholders. It piloted its wage protection system that included domestic workers’ salaries for the first time and signed agreements with four prominent labor-sending countries to stringently regulate domestic worker recruitment. In addition, the government fully implemented regulations for the domestic worker law that expanded legal protections for this vulnerable population and adopted and enforced an associated bylaw during the reporting period. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. The government did not report convicting any labor traffickers during the reporting period or providing protective services for any labor trafficking victims. Despite some initial reforms, the sponsorship system continued to heighten some foreign workers’ vulnerability to trafficking. The government did not routinely employ its proactive identification and referral mechanism, which resulted in the penalization of some potential victims and rendering others without care.

PROSECUTION

The government reported overall increased anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts, but efforts to address forced labor remained weak. Federal Law 51 of 2006 and its amendments in Federal Law No.1 of 2015 criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties ranging from five years to life in prison, as well as fines ranging from 50,000 to 99,100 UAE dirham (AED) ($13,610 to $26,980) and deportation for non-citizens. These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Federal Law No. 10 of 2017 provided additional protections for domestic workers, as well regulations for recruitment agencies and employers of such workers, including those pertaining to hiring practices, working conditions, and employment contracts. Federal Law No. 10 protected workers’ rights to retain their own identity documents, but did not stipulate penalties for employers who confiscated workers’ passports.

The government historically had not reported statistics on investigations of suspected trafficking cases. However, according to media reports, during the reporting year the government prosecuted 38 sex trafficking cases across the seven emirates, compared with 30 cases (including one for forced labor) the year prior. Officials reported conviction of 67 sex traffickers (media reported conviction of 22 sex traffickers) and administered sentences ranging from six months to life imprisonment, with the vast majority of perpetrators receiving five years or more. Six cases remained ongoing at the close of the reporting period, and one forced labor case stemming from 2018 also remained pending. During the previous year, the government convicted 35 sex trafficking defendants under trafficking laws and handed down similar punishments. The government did not report convicting any labor traffickers during the reporting period, on trend with previous years. In one specific case during the year, after receiving a trafficking-related tip, the Dubai police set up an undercover operation at a local nightclub and discovered 18 young females forced to work as erotic dancers. Officials referred the underage girls to the government-run shelter for care and charged the nightclub owner and four other accomplices with trafficking. Media reported the defendants doctored the ages on the victims’ passports and lured them to Dubai with promises of well-paying jobs then subsequently subjected them to sex trafficking. The government found the five defendants guilty of trafficking and sentenced them to five years in prison each.

The government did not routinely investigate as possible trafficking crimes violations of Emirati labor laws that exhibited trafficking indicators, such as passport confiscation, delayed or nonpayment of wages, physical abuse or fraud, and contract switching; the government treated these cases most often exclusively as regulatory violations, levying administrative fines or the cancellation of business licenses in lieu of criminal proceedings. Labor violations, including those involving forced labor, continued to be addressed by Ministry of Human Resources and Emiratization (MOHRE)-administered dispute resolution processes and labor courts instead of specific human trafficking laws. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of officials complicit in trafficking crimes during the reporting year. Relevant authorities held a series of lectures and training programs in workers' residences and in recruiting offices to raise awareness on the types of trafficking crimes and ways to communicate with law enforcement authorities and shelters. The Dubai Police Human Trafficking Crime Control Center (HTCCC), the Dubai Judicial Institute (DJI), and the National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking (NCCHT), in collaboration with an international organization, planned and hosted its sixth iteration of a five-week diploma program on ways to detect and prevent trafficking, protect victims, and raise societal awareness of the problem. This program reached 384 government officials from 22 different police agencies nationwide. Dubai police also facilitated a three-week “train the trainers” seminar for 18 graduates of the aforementioned diploma program. The public prosecutor’s office facilitated a workshop on technical rules for investigating, handling, and preparing human trafficking files; the workshop also included an overview of the primary indicators of trafficking, as well as mechanisms for probing the crime effectively. Around 35 prosecutorial personnel participated in this workshop.

PROTECTION

The government maintained overall efforts to protect trafficking victims, which continued to focus exclusively on victims of sex trafficking. In 2019, the media reported the government identified and referred 19 victims (including three minors) to care, in addition to 13 victims the Dubai Foundation for Women and Children (DFWAC) reported assisting during the same year, for a total of 32 sex trafficking victims. This was compared with 51 and 25 (primarily sex trafficking) victims identified and referred to care during the previous two years, respectively. While the government had standard procedures for victim identification among foreign workers, officials did not regularly employ these procedures proactively and continued to rely predominantly on third-party referrals to identify victims, including from foreign embassies, religious institutions, or tips received through government hotlines, smartphone applications, and the internet. Authorities continued to implement a formal referral process to transfer suspected trafficking victims from detention centers, hospitals, houses of worship, or facilities run by source country embassies or consulates, to government shelters upon the completion of victim identification. At times, female or male police officers in plain clothes—intended to allay victims’ anxieties—escorted victims, identified by law enforcement, from a government-run detention center to a shelter; however, reports persisted that some victims were unwilling to approach law enforcement officials due to (real or perceived) fear of being sent to prison for immigration or other violations rather than being accepted into a shelter.

The shelters were largely funded through individual donations, notably from the ruling family of Abu Dhabi emirate, as well as contributions from public and private companies and religious institutions. The government maintained oversight and funding for shelters in four of the seven emirates (Dubai, Abu Dhabi, Ras Al Khaimah, and Sharjah), offering housing and assistance for all female and child sex trafficking and abuse victims across the country. The government operated one shelter for men in Abu Dhabi, but it did not serve any male victims during the year. Protective services included medical, psychological, legal, educational, rehabilitation and reintegration, vocational training and certificates, and voluntary repatriation that included prolonged follow-up care after the victim returned home. Children received services tailored to their needs, including separate living sections and supervisors, as well as teachers who provided age-appropriate educational and psycho-social support. All police departments had a special room for interviewing children and other vulnerable victims. The Philippines, Indian, and Sri Lankan embassies in Abu Dhabi and the Philippines, Indonesian, and Sri Lankan consulates in Dubai provided shelter and other protective services to an unspecified number of female nationals who had been subjected to trafficking during the reporting period. Other consulates used “foster families” of the same nationality to host victims until their cases were resolved. During the reporting year, officials allocated 207,500 AED ($56,490) to the trafficking victims support fund, which financially supported repatriation or resettlement to prevent recidivism.

Shelter staff claimed that identified sex trafficking victims were not jailed, fined, or prosecuted for violations committed as a result of their being subjected to trafficking. However, other independent observers alleged authorities reportedly jailed some potential victims for prostitution offenses, consensual sex outside marriage, or absconding from their employers. Because the government did not routinely use victim identification procedures or screen for potential trafficking crimes among vulnerable populations, it may have prosecuted some unidentified victims during the year. In January 2020, local media reported on Ras Al Khaimah Criminal Court’s sentencing of four women to three years in jail for commercial sex; however, the details of the cases and associated allegations remained unclear, although the media claimed traffickers exploited the women in sex trafficking. The government reported it exempted from fines forced labor victims who had overstayed their visas or sex trafficking victims but did not report the exact number of those who benefitted from this exemption during the reporting period. The government did not provide permanent or formal temporary residency status to victims; however, it permitted victims to stay in shelters and participate in court proceedings, and worked with international organizations to resettle in third countries victims who could not return to their countries of origin. Interior officials amended the status of a few victims to assist them in seeking follow-on job opportunities in the UAE. Laborers whose employer had not paid them for 60 days were entitled to legally remain in the country and search for a new employer. The government reported funding repatriation in July 2019 for at least nine male victims but did not report a total number repatriated during the reporting period. Shelter staff noted they assisted an unknown number of trafficking victims in finding new employment or sponsors on an ad-hoc basis. The government encouraged victims to assist in the investigation and prosecution of traffickers and provided victim-witness protective services, including private interview rooms, free legal counseling, and safe transportation to court hearings. Police took counter-retaliation measures and prohibited communication between the victim and suspect. Police also enforced two governmental decrees aimed at ensuring the media adhered to victims’ privacy and that shelters adequately protected victims. According to the NCCHT, victims were informed and assured of their rights when giving testimony. Both police and shelter representatives reported victims often chose immediate repatriation at the UAE’s expense rather than remaining in country to testify against alleged traffickers or see a case through to final adjudication. Laborers were entitled to freely seek new employment in the country after 60 days of wage non-payment by their existing employer by going through the Ministry of Interior to arbitrate the process. During the reporting year, nearly 8 percent of the private sector workforce changed employers.

PREVENTION

The government increased efforts to prevent trafficking but did not demonstrate any new steps to dismantle the sponsorship system. Various government and quasi-government organizations held numerous training programs, organized lectures, and conducted workshops throughout the reporting period in an effort to raise awareness of trafficking among authorities and vulnerable populations. The government continued to carry out its national action plan to address trafficking, driven chiefly by the NCCHT. The plan focused on prevention, protection, prosecution, punishment, promotion of international cooperation, redress, rehabilitation, reintegration, and capacity building. During the year, a senior Emirati delegation participated in Bahrain’s inaugural Middle East anti-trafficking forum, and committed to regionally specific efforts to include reformation of the notorious kafala system. The government amplified awareness on trafficking through increased informational notices at airports, training courses for high-risk groups, and the dissemination of publications in various languages directed at the most at-risk communities, effectively reaching tens of thousands of individuals during the year. The campaigns raised awareness of penalties for trafficking and publicized hotlines for more information or direct assistance. Airport banners specifically targeted terminals based on nationalities with high workforce numbers in the UAE. The government educated passengers at Dubai International Airport (DXB) about trafficking through clips, broadcasts, flyers, and tactically-situated massive banners in nine prominent languages. Dubai Police, NCCHT, and DXB, in partnership with an international organization, launched a two-year campaign in July 2019 entitled “Don’t Turn a Blind Eye.” The campaign aimed to raise awareness of airport employees and travelers on how to detect trafficking crimes, given DXB remained one of the busiest international hubs in the world. Government shelter staff maintained a partnership with art galleries for visual art exhibits that showcased art made by trafficking victims, to both increase awareness and raise funds for other victims. DFWAC partnered with government-owned real estate developer Nakheel to run awareness campaigns at the developer’s shopping centers, particularly in its Dubai International City area, where many domestic workers resided and worked, to combat internal trafficking. Fujairah Police carried out anti-trafficking awareness campaigns via social media platforms and SMS functions. During the reporting year, local media ran a report on human trafficking, and presented numbers to call for help, including DFWAC and police in Abu Dhabi, Dubai, and Sharjah; the program also highlighted relevant UAE laws. Launched in April 2019 by Interior officials, the “Community Awareness” phone application promulgated information about a range of issues, including child protection, the duties of employers and employees, and trafficking in Arabic, Chinese, English, Filipino, Malay, and Urdu. Emirates Airlines, which is owned by the Dubai government, trained its cabin crewmembers and other airport ground staff on detecting instances of human trafficking at check-in and on flights. The government funded and ran a 24-hour toll-free hotline for reporting cases of trafficking, delayed wage payments, or other labor violations, which operated in Arabic, English, Hindi, Russian, Tagalog, and Urdu. Calls were categorized and automatically alerted police in suspected trafficking cases. In Dubai, authorities ran a separate line, and UAE-wide there remained a 24-hour toll-free number for migrant laborers to vocalize workplace complaints or general inquiries. Analogous to the year prior, the government did not report how many trafficking or trafficking-related calls any hotline received during the reporting year.

The government implemented Federal Law No.10 of 2017 to improve the work conditions and welfare of domestic employees and adopted Cabinet Resolution No. 22 of 2019, which grants domestic workers the right to terminate their employment if an employer fails to meet contractual obligations or if the employee is subject to sexual harassment or physical or verbal abuse by the employer. However, the government did not strengthen regulatory enforcement of in-home inspections and workplace grievance resolution. In addition, sociocultural and legal barriers against government interference with private households continued to hamper monitoring and enforcement efforts of its domestic worker law. This law included the right for employees to retain personal documents, sign standardized contracts with unequivocally designated working conditions, access specialized tribunals for settling workplace grievances, and observe mandatory time off. It also stipulated in-home inspections on the basis of complaints or reasonable evidence of law violations. Under the law’s provisions, a recruitment agency or person who hindered law enforcement, anyone who disclosed information unveiled in an investigation, or anyone who facilitated the abandonment of a domestic worker may be jailed for a minimum of six months and ordered to pay a 10,000 to 100,000 AED ($2,720 to $27,230) fine.

MOHRE primarily oversaw, regulated, and enforced labor-related complaints. Efforts by MOHRE to combat forced labor across the UAE included an extensive labor inspection program that incorporated routine and unannounced inspections of housing and work sites by a team of full-time labor inspectors, in addition to seven dedicated anti-trafficking inspectors. Authorities usually dealt with labor law violations administratively and did not report investigating such cases for trafficking indicators or referring any for criminal prosecution. The government continued its monitoring and inspection program for regulation of private sector laborers, including through the wage protection system (WPS), which electronically monitored salary payments via vetted banks, currency exchanges, and financial institutions for all onshore companies employing more than 100 workers (96 percent of the private sector workforce). The WPS automatically flagged delayed salary payments of more than 60 days or payments that were less than contractually agreed upon, and after a designated period, authorities administered fines and other enforcement actions, including criminal proceedings after an unknown number of labor-related inspections. However, a local news investigation in the previous reporting period estimated that almost 50 percent of all small private construction and transport companies circumvented the WPS to pay workers only 60 percent of their contractual salaries. Media and diplomatic sources reported some companies retained workers’ bank cards or accompanied workers to withdraw cash, coercively shortchanging the employees even though the WPS showed the proper amount paid. Such cases were difficult to prove in labor courts, given the WPS documented accurate payments via designated bank accounts. On trend with previous years, the government did not report the number of complaints of unpaid wages it investigated as a result of its dispute resolution process or the WPS, which were intended to ensure workers were paid according to their contracts and not subjected to forced labor. If employers were punished with administrative and financial penalties for compliance failure, it also did not report investigating such cases for trafficking indicators or referring any for criminal prosecution. Workplace grievances routinely resulted in fines, suspended permits to hire new workers, or the cancellation of business licenses, though the official number of these punishments was unknown. Domestic worker salaries were not required to be paid via the WPS and, coupled with cultural norms and the lack of legal provisions requiring inspections of domestic worker accommodations, wage payment, and work hour abuses, among other acts indicative of forced labor, rendered domestic workers vulnerable to exploitation. However, during the reporting period, officials successfully rolled out a trial phase of the WPS that included domestic worker salaries.

Officials continued to employ public-private partnership recruitment centers for domestic workers, known as “Tadbeer Centers,” mandated to regulate the recruitment and training of domestic workers, educate them on their legal rights, resolve employer-employee disputes, and verify worker accommodations for compliance with domestic worker law minimum standards. Each center was equipped with a room solely for grievance mediation, with a video connection to MOHRE for official oversight. In practice, however, these centers were inhibited as they were not generally able to enter or inspect private homes. There were 23 operational Tadbeer Centers across the UAE as of the end of the reporting period. The centers were integral to the movement of domestic worker recruitment from the Ministry of Interior to MOHRE, a change aimed at improving recruitment regulation and standards. In September 2019, the UAE and Government of the Philippines signed a trafficking-specific memorandum of understanding (MOU), which adopted procedures and created a joint taskforce to combat the crime as well as share best practices, exchange information, promote human rights, and provide assistance in the protection, repatriation, recovery, and rehabilitation of trafficking victims in accordance with domestic laws. In June 2019, the government signed several MOUs with labor sending countries to regulate recruitment mechanisms. The agreements with The Gambia, Nepal, and Pakistan outlined a recruitment mechanism that required designated ministries in said countries to review and approve a worker’s job offer before submission to the MOHRE, where an electronic copy was filed to prevent contract switching. These MOUs also facilitated the recruitment of domestic workers to the UAE solely through Tadbeer Centers. The UAE had other MOUs with Armenia, Australia, Azerbaijan, Indonesia, and Thailand. The government did not enforce a prohibition on employers withholding workers’ passports, which remained a pervasive problem. The government did not take measures to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts in the UAE. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs maintained provision of workshops and awareness programs on human trafficking for its diplomatic personnel.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit foreign victims in the UAE. Foreign workers comprise nearly 90 percent of the UAE’s population and are recruited globally. Lower wage labor, including most manual labor and a significant portion of the service sector, is provided almost entirely by migrant workers predominantly from South and Southeast Asia and the Middle East, with a growing percentage from East and West Africa. It is not uncommon for employers to subject some of these workers to conditions indicative of forced labor, such as passport retention, non-payment of wages and unpaid overtime, restrictions on movement, contract switching, fraudulent employment promises, substandard food and housing provisions, or a failure to meet other contractual agreements. Women and men from some of these countries travel willingly to the UAE to work as domestic workers, security guards, drivers, gardeners, massage therapists, beauticians, hotel cleaners, or elsewhere in the service sector, but traffickers subject some of them to forced labor or sex trafficking after arrival. Reports indicate the UAE serves as a trafficking hub where recruiters sell migrants to families who subsequently illegally transport them to other countries in the Gulf. The UAE has in recent years become a primary destination for Ugandans seeking employment as domestic workers and security guards. Many Pakistanis are reportedly hired on promises they will receive handsome salaries, medical benefits, and accommodations, but after reaching the UAE the promises go unfulfilled, with some Pakistanis discovering that the companies that hired them are fraudulent. For expatriate workers and domestic workers especially, the kafala or sponsorship system in the UAE restricts their ability to leave a position without prior notice. Despite legal measures allowing workers to change sponsors or terminate their employment, some employers continue to exercise unilateral power over foreign workers’ movements, deny laborers working illegally the ability to change employers, restrict permission for them to leave the country, and threaten employees with abuse of legal processes, which heightens their vulnerability to trafficking. Traffickers subject some women, predominantly from Central Asia, South and Southeast Asia, East Africa, Eastern Europe, Iraq, Iran, and Morocco, to sex trafficking in the UAE, and most trafficking cases registered in the UAE are classified as sexual exploitation despite significant labor trafficking concerns. Per media sources, some cases of child sex trafficking involve traffickers forging ages on passports to facilitate undetected entry into the UAE. Other reporting claims recruiters in some source countries work as individual agents rather than for regulated companies, complicating law enforcement and monitoring efforts.

Although illegal under UAE law, many source-country labor recruiters charge workers exorbitant fees in their home countries (outside of UAE jurisdiction), causing workers to commence employment in the UAE owing debts in their respective countries of origin, increasing their vulnerability to trafficking through debt-based coercion. Despite new laws to prevent the practice, reports of employers engaging in the practice of contract-swapping persist, leading to less desirable and lower paying jobs for laborers post-arrival in the UAE. Traffickers often recruit victims from the large foreign population already in the country; they may deceive or compel a migrant worker in the UAE, willingly on a tourist or work visa, into forced labor or sex trafficking. Additionally, some laborers enter the UAE on tourist visas and start working for an employer who subsequently opts to not change the tourist visa to a work one in order to grant legal residency, a common method of exploitation. According to UAE shelter staff, migrant workers will sometimes start with one employer and for various reasons, including abuse or exploitation, low salary, or simple dissatisfaction with the job, will follow alternate employment opportunities that ultimately prove fictitious, as traffickers in the UAE are adept at using manipulation to entice laborers with “higher salaries.” North Koreans working in the UAE may have been forced to work by the North Korean government. In October 2017, the UAE pledged to stop issuing new visas and company licenses to North Korean workers and, in late 2019, closed the last DPRK businesses in the UAE. According to the UAE’s assessment in 2020, the number of DPRK workers in the UAE has been reduced to seven from approximately 500.

During the previous reporting period, an international organization alleged the government, a member of a multi-nation coalition that commenced military operations against Houthi rebel forces in Yemen in 2015, provided training and coordinated operations with the Security Belt Forces, Hadhrami Elite Forces, and Shabwani Elite Forces—proxy militias fighting Houthi forces and terrorists in Yemen that allegedly recruited and used children as soldiers. Media also previously reported officers associated with Sudan’s Rapid Support Force took bribes from families to permit minors to serve as combatants in Yemen during that reporting year. Emirati officers supposedly trained and commanded some Sudanese combatants during the previous reporting period. While the UAE did not directly commission those forces, there were Sudanese units under the Saudi-led Coalition fighting with Emirati and Yemeni Government forces during those years. However, during the current reporting year, there were no allegations the UAE recruited, used, or detained any child soldiers, and in September 2019, the UAE reportedly ceased providing direct support to Security Belt Forces after the signing of the Riyadh Agreement.

UNITED KINGDOM: TIER 1
The Government of the United Kingdom (UK) fully meets the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The government continued to demonstrate serious and sustained efforts during the reporting period; therefore the UK remained on Tier 1. These efforts included increasing prosecutions and convictions; identifying significantly more potential victims; and increasing funding for anti-trafficking efforts. Additionally, the government expanded child services to one-third of all local authorities across England and Wales and created a new International Modern Slavery and Migration Envoys position. Furthermore, to address trafficking in its own supply chains, the government published a statement detailing efforts to ensure its operations and supply chains are free of trafficking, and required all of its departments to ensure bidders of government contracts published such statements. Although the government meets the minimum standards, protection services for child victims continued to need increased attention and resources, and long-term care and reintegration support for victims remained inadequate. The government did not compile comprehensive data on sentences imposed on convicted traffickers. Some victims were cautious about entering the national referral system due to delays in review of their status leading to inconsistent availability of longer-term care.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Expand nationwide the Independent Child Trafficking Guardians (ICTG) program and train more social workers and care providers to better safeguard child victims. • Implement reforms to the National Referral Mechanism (NRM), including timely determination of victim status, to encourage more victims to come forward. • Extend the period of victim support across all UK jurisdictions and expand long-term care and reintegration support. • Establish a database on investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and prison sentence data across the UK, categorized by type of trafficking. • Provide sufficient resources for expeditious processing of trafficking investigations and prosecutions. • Ensure the statutory definition of trafficking under the Modern Slavery Act of 2015 (MSA) and similar provisions in Northern Ireland do not require movement of the victim as an element of the crime. • Provide adequate information to foreign workers, especially the most vulnerable, on their legal rights and how to maintain their status in the UK post-exit from the EU. • Provide a trafficking-specific long-term alternative for foreign victims at risk if returned to their home country.

PROSECUTION
The government increased prosecution efforts. The MSA, applicable to England and Wales, and similar statutes in Scotland and Northern Ireland, criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of up to life imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent and, with regard to sex trafficking, commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Inconsistent with international law, the laws in England, Wales, and Northern Ireland required the element of movement of a victim in the definition of “trafficking.” However, these jurisdictions criminalized “slavery and servitude, and forced or compulsory labour” in other provisions of their law, which could be utilized to prosecute trafficking offenses that did not involve victim movement. Scotland, by contrast, did not require victim movement in the definition of trafficking. As of October, the government reported 1,090 police trafficking investigations in England and Wales, compared with 1,124 in 2018. The Crown Prosecution Service (CPS), which handled cases in England and Wales, prosecuted 349 defendants on trafficking charges with 251 convictions in 2019, compared with 294 prosecutions and 191 convictions in 2018. CPS data did not differentiate between sex and labor trafficking, nor did the government provide data on the range of sentencing of convicted traffickers or percentage of convicted traffickers serving prison time. During the reporting period, courts convicted a man serving as a special constable for the Metropolitan Police Service to four years’ imprisonment for sex trafficking. In 2019, Scotland reported one prosecution and one conviction, compared with 10 prosecutions and no convictions in 2018. Police Scotland had a specialized anti-trafficking unit to coordinate information and intelligence and work with law enforcement agencies across Europe to investigate trafficking cases. In 2019, authorities in Northern Ireland arrested two traffickers for domestic servitude—the first arrest for domestic servitude in Northern Ireland. Additional 2019 data was unavailable; however, in 2018, authorities in Northern Ireland reported five prosecutions and two convictions. According to its Ministry of Justice, the greatest impediment to the timely prosecution of alleged traffickers in Northern Ireland remained inherent delays in the legal system, often taking two or more years from the time of initial arrest to conviction. In 2019, the Police Service in Northern Ireland added five new detectives to the anti-trafficking unit to help manage the potential increase in cases as a result of the UK leaving the EU, in light of Northern Ireland’s land border with the EU.

The government provided a wide variety of anti-trafficking training to law enforcement officers, prosecutors, and justice officials at multiple levels. The national-level College of Policing continued to offer training to all front-line officers. The Modern Slavery Police Transformation Unit (MSPTU) received £3.1 million ($4.09 million) in supplementary funding to develop intelligence, identify best practices, and share information to equip law enforcement with the knowledge to respond to trafficking. The MSPTU also provided guidelines to police on all aspects of investigations, including victim identification. The CPS had 14 Complex Case Units in jurisdictions across England and Wales that provided initial specialized advice in investigations and prosecutions wherever human trafficking offenses had been committed. During 2019, the CPS conducted mandatory training for all prosecutors responsible for trafficking cases. Police forces in England and Wales used Anti-Slavery Commissioner guidelines and manuals in their training, and sentencing councils in England and Wales provided judges with sentencing guidelines for significant offenses, including trafficking. The Scottish government conducted five 90-minute training sessions for 70 social workers to raise awareness on trafficking. Likewise, the Gangmasters and Labour Abuse Authority conducted 20 sessions on trafficking in Scotland.

The National Crime Agency’s (NCA) International Liaison Officer Network worked with a wide range of law enforcement partners in other countries to develop capacity and capabilities to combat trafficking. The UK participated in 24 Joint Investigation Teams (JITs) with seven EU Member States, including 11 JITs with Romania. Subsequently, the UK employed a CPS Liaison Magistrate in Romania to work closely with Romanian law enforcement on prosecutions resulting from JITs. In July, authorities from the UK and Poland partnered in the largest trafficking operation to date in the UK, involving the arrest of eight traffickers and rescue of more than 400 trafficking victims. Furthermore, the UK and Vietnam partnered to undertake investigations of illicit finances of traffickers and established a Joint, Serious Organized Crime Working Group to fight trafficking and child sexual abuse. In an October incident that received international media coverage, the bodies of 39 Vietnamese nationals were found in the back of a refrigerated truck in Essex; the driver of the truck was charged with manslaughter as well as trafficking and immigration offenses. The case remained ongoing at the end of the reporting period. In 2019, prompted by a case of a foreign diplomat accused of enslaving a domestic worker in the UK, the Employment Tribunal ruled that claiming diplomatic immunity did not protect against trafficking charges.

PROTECTION
The government increased protection efforts. Through the NRM, authorities referred 10,627 potential trafficking victims for care nationwide in 2019, a 52 percent increase from 6,993 in 2018. The Home Office maintained a detailed database online with disaggregated information, including source of referral, nationality, jurisdiction, handling the referral, type of trafficking, and disposition of review. Of the referred victims, 3,391 were female; 7,224 were male; one was transgender; and the gender of 11 was unknown. Authorities identified 4,550 minors, an increase from 3,137 in 2018, due in large part to heightened awareness among the public and authorities about “County Lines” gang recruitment of children as couriers of drugs across the country. While the authorities reported potential victims came from 123 nationalities, the majority of identified victims were UK citizens (2,836). Labor trafficking was the most common form of exploitation in adults and minors. In Scotland, the number of victims referred to the NRM increased by 125 percent from 2018 to 2019. Similarly, in Northern Ireland, officials reported a significant increase in the number of potential victims referred to the NRM from 52 in 2018 to 91 in 2019.

The NRM was the framework for identifying and providing care and support for victims. In September, the Home Office deployed the referral process online. First responders, such as police, Border Force, local authorities, and specified NGOs typically generated referrals. Written guidelines existed to assist in victim identification and referral. The Home Office instituted a single case management unit to handle all NRM referrals to improve comprehensive attention to victims, consolidate the work of the NCA and UK Visas and Immigration, and make a “reasonable grounds” decision on whether an individual could be a trafficking victim. A “reasonable grounds” decision for adults triggered provision of victim support and protection measures, whereby the victim started a minimum 45-day reflection period with access to services such as accommodation, health care, and counseling, and decided whether to assist in the investigation and prosecution of the perpetrator. During this period, the unit assessed the individual’s status as a victim and made a “conclusive grounds” decision, which if positive allowed the victim 45 additional days of transitional support. The MSA required a final determination of victim status within 45 days in England and Wales, although in many cases the government extended this deadline. Scotland’s law provided a 90-day timeframe, and Northern Ireland remained at a single 45-day period. NGOs warned of victims being re-trafficked while waiting for final determination of victim status, which at times took longer than a year. Furthermore, NGOs expressed concern that the lack of long-term support for victims after they left the NRM put them at greater risk of re-trafficking. Subsequently, in 2019, the government funded pilot programs to assess long-term support and best practices for victims departing the NRM and transitioning back into communities.

The government provided £20 million (£26.39 million) to an NGO through 2020 to coordinate the provision of care for adult victims in England and Wales under the NRM. The Scottish government provided approximately £1 million ($1.32 million) to the two NGOs providing victim protection and support for 2018-2019, and it committed to a three-year funding agreement with both NGOs. The NCA continued its “Vulnerable Persons Team,” which granted victim assistance to avoid re-victimization after completion of an investigation. Similarly, the Wales Anti-Slavery Leadership Group’s “Survivor Care Pathway” provided a long-term post-NRM individualized plan for survivors. The government encouraged efforts of private companies to assist in reintegration, particularly through employment of survivors. Under the “Bright Future” campaign, a national retail cooperative continued to hire and train survivors in partnership with an NGO, a model the government promoted for expansion.

Children received care through children’s services offices in local jurisdictions. The MSA also provided for the appointment of ICTGs as an additional source of support and advocacy for trafficked children. In 2019, the government expanded the ICTG service to one-third of all local authorities across England and Wales. NGOs reported nearly a quarter of the children referred to the service went missing, mostly on a temporary basis, and approximately 34 percent went missing before meeting with their ICTG. Local authorities highlighted concerns over the high number of children who either left or were missing from care or foster homes and were especially vulnerable to trafficking by gangs. NGOs estimated up to two-thirds of all child victims going missing within 72 hours of placement for care and up to 20 percent remain missing. The MSA review committee recommended implementation of the ICTG system nationally, along with sufficient duration for providing services to child victims, in addition to requiring police to track cases of missing children until they are located, regardless of timeframe. NGOs expressed concern that when victims reach the age of 18 and were no longer eligible for the ICTG service, they were once again at risk of re-trafficking. In 2019, the government published a report evaluating the impact of ICTG services. The report recommended that more work needed to be done to help transition children into adult services that may not have a focus on trafficking victims and suggested that prior to the national rollout of the service, the Home Office needed to conduct a review into why a high rate of children went missing after six months of receiving ICTG services. Scotland and Northern Ireland also required appointment of independent legal guardians for child trafficking victims and trained them on the support services available.

Foreign victims were not automatically granted status in the UK; both detention and deportation were considered on a case-by-case basis. Foreign victims who assisted with investigations were eligible for residency. Foreign victims who were granted a reflection period could not be removed from the UK during that period; however, NGOs reported authorities attempted to deport victims who were already in the NRM system. As a result, some foreign victims were reluctant to seek assistance or opted to petition for asylum instead of entry into the NRM, given the potential for longer residency in the UK. Additionally, as the UK prepared to separate from the EU, NGOs expressed concern that victims would be more reluctant to come forward due to lack of awareness of their legal rights and fear of making their immigration status known to authorities. Foreign overseas domestic workers (ODW) could legally change employers during the six-month period of their visa. Workers on the ODW visa identified as trafficking victims could apply for a two-year visa as a domestic worker, although NGOs contended workers who had suffered abuse would be unlikely to want to return to the same sector. Foreign nationals identified as trafficking victims could apply for discretionary leave to remain in the UK if supporting the investigation, seeking compensation through a civil claim against the perpetrator, or in some cases based on personal circumstances. Foreign victims could petition for asylum, based on risks faced if returned to their country of origin.

Victims had a statutory defense for crimes committed as a direct result of being subjected to trafficking, and courts allowed victims
PREVENTION
The government increased prevention efforts. The prime minister continued to chair a national coordinating task force. The Independent Anti-Slavery Commissioner released a two-year strategy, identifying top anti-trafficking priorities. The Home Office published its 2019 annual report in October, with detailed data on anti-trafficking efforts across the UK, as well as outlining achievements and remaining challenges in fully implementing the MSA. In May, a government-commissioned committee completed a review of the effectiveness of the MSA, recommending increasing the independence of the role of the anti-slavery commissioner, improving corporate reporting on transparency in supply chains, and expanding protections for children under the ICTG system across all regions of the UK. The government accepted or partially accepted most recommendations, including creating and appointing a new International Modern Slavery and Migration Envoy position to drive forward the global response to trafficking and work closely with the Independent Anti-Slavery Commissioner, who is domestically focused.

Total direct government spending to fight human trafficking, on both the domestic and global fronts, increased significantly to £61 million ($80.47 million) for 2018-2019 from £39 million ($51.45 million) for 2017-2018. The government invested £10 million ($13.19 million) over a five-year period to fund a new Modern Slavery Policy and Evidence Centre to better understand trafficking and how to confront it and develop research to inform policy choices. The government conducted awareness campaigns across the UK to help educate citizens, including online and television advertising campaigns, news articles, and documentaries, as well as extensive training for first responders. In England and Wales, the government conducted a “Hidden in Plain Sight” campaign to highlight labor exploitation and labor trafficking, targeting front-line professionals in the financial, health care, and recruitment sectors in four English regions. The UK Border Force shared awareness-raising training and support materials with airline, ferry, and rail carriers to educate employees on trafficking indicators. The Scottish government commissioned a survey on public perceptions of trafficking—what it is, where it occurs, and how to report concerns. The justice department in Northern Ireland conducted a training needs assessment, analyzing knowledge gaps among front-line professionals starting with the health care sector.

The MSA required organizations with annual revenue exceeding £36 million ($47.49 million) to publish an annual statement detailing efforts to ensure its operations and supply chains are free of human trafficking. Critics noted inconsistent quality of organizations’ statements and the lack of a penalty for non-compliance. To address trafficking in its own supply chains, the government published a statement in 2019 and required all of its departments to ensureidders of government contracts published statements. In preparation for the UK’s exit from the EU, a future migration policy was in development, including a seasonal workers pilot, aimed to ensure that fruit and vegetable farmers could legally employ migrant farmers for seasonal work for up to six months. NGOs continued to criticize the government for ineffective implementation of labor recruitment law and regulations, suggesting workers recruited from overseas were often unaware of their rights. The Department for International Development allocated £3 million ($3.96 million) to NCA to investigate child sex tourists in high risk destination countries, especially the Philippines, and establish and deploy a team of specialized officers to support law enforcement agencies in those countries. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts.

The government funded a wide range of anti-trafficking programs globally, including continued implementation of programs under the £33.5 million ($44.2 million) Modern Slavery Fund, of which the government committed £7.5 million ($9.9 million) mainly to training in 2019. The government provided support in both Nigeria and Vietnam on strengthening the operational law enforcement response to trafficking cases, including capacity building training and provision of resources to the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons and the judiciary in Nigeria and training law enforcement officials in Vietnam. The government funded workshops in Romania, teaching Romanian Orthodox clergy how to recognize indicators of trafficking, refer victims to services, and support victim reintegration into their community following exploitation. The government also worked on improving understanding of trafficking among Romanian child support social workers in regions where child exploitation was prevalent. In Lithuania, the UK embassy worked with the Lithuanian government and a Lithuanian NGO to develop and conduct a campaign raising awareness about labor exploitation in the Lithuanian diaspora in Cambridgeshire. This included training on recognizing potential signs of exploitation, running social media advertisements in both English and Lithuanian, and dispersing leaflets translated into Lithuanian around community hubs such a social clubs and churches. The UK’s Commonwealth Parliamentary Association works with Commonwealth countries to pass human trafficking legislation, using a tailored approach suited to each country’s needs and capacity. The government committed £20 million ($26.39 million) in cooperation with the United States, other governments, and private donors, to target programs in coordination under the Global Fund to End Modern Slavery.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in the UK. The government reports 10,627 potential victims came through the NRM, with the latest government estimates of up to 13,000 trafficking victims present in the UK. Potential victims comprise 123 nationalities with the largest source countries being the UK, Albania, and Vietnam. Twenty-six percent of potential victims assert their exploitation occurred entirely outside of the UK. Labor trafficking is the most common form of exploitation among adults and minors. Nearly half of all victims identified are children. Children in the care system and unaccompanied migrant children are particularly at risk of trafficking. Youth trafficked by gangs are forced to act as drug couriers from larger cities into rural areas across the UK. Traffickers force adults and children to work in agriculture, cannabis cultivation, construction, food processing, factories, domestic service, nail salons, food services, the hospitality industry, and car washes, as well as on fishing boats. In Scotland, most victims are from Vietnam with many forced to work in agriculture, particularly cannabis farms, and nail bars. In Northern Ireland, there are cases of perpetrators forcing victims into shoplifting and the cultivation and distribution of illicit drugs. Young women and girls from Albania, Bulgaria, and Romania, including ethnic Roma, remain vulnerable to sex trafficking in Northern Ireland.
The Government of the United States fully meets the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The government continued to demonstrate serious and sustained efforts during the reporting period; therefore the United States remained on Tier 1. These efforts included increasing the number of investigations, increasing the amount of funding for victim services, and increasing enforcement of the prohibition of imports made wholly or in part by forced labor. Although the government meets the minimum standards, it prosecuted fewer cases and secured convictions against fewer traffickers, issued fewer victims trafficking-specific immigration benefits, and did not adequately screen vulnerable populations for human trafficking indicators. Anti-trafficking advocates reported a continued lack of sustained effort to address labor trafficking, increased obstacles for foreign nationals to secure victim protections, and a systemic inability to prevent traffickers from using employment-based and other nonimmigrant visa programs.

Prioritized Recommendations:

- Increase investigation and prosecution of labor trafficking cases.
- Reduce obstacles for victims to appropriately obtain trafficking-specific immigration options.
- Increase the number of trafficking investigations and prosecutions.
- Increase and diversify efforts to proactively identify potential trafficking victims among vulnerable populations.
- Seek to ensure immigration enforcement does not hinder human trafficking criminal law enforcement or victim protections.
- Increase access to victim services for men, women, girls, boys, LGBTQ+ individuals, and labor trafficking survivors, and improve access to stable housing for all victims.
- Screen all individuals in immigration detention or custody for human trafficking indicators.
- Increase the number of requests by federal law enforcement officials for Continued Presence.
- Mitigate vulnerabilities in employment-based or other nonimmigrant U.S. visa programs, including by providing protections for those who report program violations to encourage others to come forward.
- Encourage state and local authorities to implement policies not to prosecute victims for the unlawful acts their traffickers compelled them to commit.
- Develop and implement early intervention services approaches and inclusive policy initiatives that reduce the vulnerabilities of marginalized and disadvantaged communities.
- Train prosecutors and judges to increase the number of forfeiture orders and mandatory restitution orders for trafficking victims.
- Increase survivor engagement, including by more systematically incorporating survivor input when forming policies, programs, and trainings.
- Strengthen efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex.
- Increase enforcement of the law that prohibits the importation of goods made wholly or in part by forced labor.

As described in the Methodology section of this report, these recommendations were drawn from input from multiple anti-trafficking stakeholders, including NGOs and advocates, as well as from government agencies and reports, on the degree to which the United States meets the minimum standards set forth in the TVPA.

Prosecution

The government maintained prosecution efforts. The government increased the number of investigations, but the number of prosecutions decreased for the second year in a row, and the number of convictions decreased. The TVPA, as amended and codified at Title 18 U.S. Code sections 1581, et seq., criminalizes sex and labor trafficking. The penalties prescribed under these provisions, which can include up to life imprisonment, are sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with the penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. U.S. law also prohibits conspiracy and the attempt to violate these provisions, as well as obstruction of the statutes’ enforcement and the financial benefit from these acts. Additionally, a criminal statute on fraud in foreign labor contracting prohibits the use of fraud to recruit workers abroad to work in the United States or on a U.S. government contract performed outside the United States, on U.S. property, or on military installations outside the United States.

The Department of Justice (DOJ), Department of Homeland Security (DHS), Department of State (State), and Department of Defense (DoD) are the primary investigating agencies for federal human trafficking and other related offenses, with DOJ prosecuting federal human trafficking cases. DOJ, DHS, and State also support victims by engaging law enforcement victim assistance specialists during trafficking investigations and prosecutions, including by connecting identified victims to victim service providers. In fiscal year (FY) 2019, DHS increased the number of its forensic interview specialists from six to 30 and increased the number of its victim assistance specialists from 27 to 35. DOJ, in coordination with DHS and the Department of Labor (DOL), continued to develop complex human trafficking investigations and prosecutions through the Anti-Trafficking Coordination Team (ACTeam) Initiative. Districts participating in the second phase of this initiative increased the number of trafficking defendants charged and convicted by 75 and 106 percent, respectively, as compared to about seven and 28 percent, respectively, in non-ACTeam districts. DOJ, DHS, and DOL initiated an analysis of resource commitments necessary to launch the third phase of the ATeam Initiative. In addition to previously funded Enhanced Collaborative Model (ECM) anti-trafficking task forces, DOJ provided $21 million in FY 2019 to fund 15 task forces, which include 13 state and local law enforcement agencies and 12 victim service providers, compared to $23.1 million for 17 ECM task forces funded in FY 2018. Several federal agencies participated in other human trafficking task forces nationwide consisting of federal, state, and local law enforcement, as well as victim service providers.

Survivor advocates called on federally funded task forces to continue to increase engagement with local survivor leaders.

The federal government reports its law enforcement data by fiscal year, which may include joint federal and state or local initiatives but does not include separate state law enforcement data. In FY 2019, DHS opened 1,024 investigations related to human trafficking, an increase from 849 in FY 2018. DOJ formally opened 607 human trafficking investigations, a decrease from 657 in FY 2018. State reported opening 134 human trafficking-related cases worldwide during FY 2019, a decrease from 148 in FY 2018. In FY 2019, DoD reported investigating 65 human trafficking-related cases involving DoD military, civilian, and contractor personnel, a decrease from 119 in FY 2018. (Last year, the 119 cases involving DoD personnel in FY 2018 were reported separately as two human trafficking cases (2019 TIP Report, page 485) and 117 cases of alleged violations of DoD’s prohibition on procuring commercial sex (2019 TIP Report, page 490).)

DOJ initiated a total of 220 federal human trafficking prosecutions in FY 2019, a decrease from 230 in FY 2018, and charged 343 defendants, a decrease from 386 in FY 2018. Of these FY 2019 prosecutions, 208 involved predominantly sex trafficking and 12 involved predominantly labor trafficking, compared to 213 and 17 in FY 2018, respectively.

During FY 2019, DOJ secured convictions against 475 traffickers, a decrease from 526 convictions in FY 2018. Of these, 454 involved predominantly sex trafficking and 21 involved predominantly labor trafficking, compared to 501 and 25 in FY 2018, respectively.

These prosecutions and convictions include cases brought under trafficking-specific criminal statutes and non-trafficking criminal statutes, but they do not include child sex trafficking cases brought under non-trafficking statutes. Among the 266 traffickers sentenced to prison in cases brought under trafficking-specific criminal statutes, which excludes trafficking cases brought under non-trafficking statutes, terms ranged from one month to life imprisonment, with more than 78 percent of defendants receiving prison sentences of five or more years. Four traffickers received a probation-only sentence, and 11 received a suspended sentence.

DOJ convened consultations among DOJ’s anti-trafficking experts nationwide to address factors contributing to decreases in trafficking prosecutions. DHS collaborated with DOJ to train federal investigators and prosecutors on building effective human trafficking cases.

DOJ and DHS continued to advance bilateral investigations and prosecutions of transnational trafficking enterprises operating across the U.S.-Mexico border and facilitate exchanges of leads, intelligence analytics, and case mentoring between U.S. and Mexican anti-trafficking authorities. During the reporting period, DOJ increased its engagement with Mexican state-level human trafficking task forces through this initiative. The Department of the Treasury (Treasury) continued to analyze and disseminate information received from financial institutions related to human trafficking and partnered with domestic and foreign government stakeholders to support human trafficking investigations. In May 2019, Treasury launched a bilateral anti-corruption initiative with Mexico targeting four priorities, including human trafficking, which led to the formation of a task force to hold human traffickers and perpetrators of related financial crimes accountable. Treasury also has anti-money laundering and sanctions authorities, which it may use to target the finances of international human traffickers worldwide. Treasury convened more than 100 NGOs, industry, and government partners to enhance coordination on illicit finance and human trafficking networks. In FY 2019, DOL assisted in two criminal prosecutions that resulted in the incarceration of two traffickers and restitution of nearly $400,000. DOJ continued to train federal human trafficking prosecutors on restitution for victims. In FY 2019, the first two operations of the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) inspector general’s initiative to find children missing from foster care, including those at risk for human trafficking, led to the identification of more than 40 missing children, five arrests, and four human trafficking investigations.

Advocates continued to call for federal prosecutors to seek, and for courts to award, mandatory restitution for both sex and labor trafficking cases, citing concerns about both the low number of cases in which it was ordered and the low rate of payment of restitution to trafficking victims consistent with restitution orders. One NGO noted the number of defendants convicted of a crime that triggered mandatory restitution ordered to pay restitution in 2019 remained at approximately 40 percent. Advocates also called for increased training of prosecutors and judges on mandatory restitution, urged the government to use its available authorities, such as forfeiture and imprisonment, to ensure compliance with restitution orders, and noted that, while not required, victim witnesses lack independent legal counsel to assist in obtaining restitution on their behalf.

Advocates reported very few labor trafficking cases they referred to law enforcement were investigated and called for increased training of relevant officials and efforts to identify, investigate, and prosecute labor trafficking cases. NGOs and a study released during the reporting period noted insufficient resources dedicated to investigating and prosecuting labor trafficking cases. They also cited a lack of familiarity with how forced labor takes place in various employment settings inhibited law enforcement’s ability to increase such cases.

State laws form the basis of most criminal actions in the United States. All U.S. states and territories have anti-trafficking criminal statutes. In addition, 45 states had laws allowing survivors to seek a court order vacating, expunging, or sealing criminal convictions entered against them that resulted from unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, although in four of these states such relief only applied to child trafficking victims. At least 34 states had “safe harbor” laws, which are meant to prevent child sex trafficking victims from being prosecuted for commercial sex.

One NGO reported the degree of relief available under some state vacatur laws for trafficking victims with criminal records resulting from unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit was limited. In addition, NGO and survivor advocates called for the adoption of federal vacatur legislation.

Advocates continued to report trafficking victims were arrested at the state and local levels for the unlawful acts their traffickers compelled them to commit, including commercial sex, drug trafficking, and possession of false identification documents, and even in some states with “safe harbor” laws, child victims were arrested. One NGO noted only 18 states protected child sex trafficking victims from being prosecuted for crimes other than commercial sex, including loitering, drug possession, and indecent exposure. An NGO expressed concern with the practice of law enforcement threatening criminal charges against trafficking victims to compel them to cooperate in a case against their trafficker.

The federal government continued to collect state and local data on human trafficking investigations during the reporting period through the Uniform Crime Reporting (UCR) Program. Data from 2018 collected from participating jurisdictions are publicly available. Participating jurisdictions represented 94 percent of U.S. states in 2018, compared to 90 percent the previous year. (The 2017 percentage (90) represents a correction to the percentage cited last year (78).) Not all agencies within all states have the ability to report data to the UCR Program. In 2018, participating jurisdictions reported a total of 548 human trafficking offenses resulting in arrest or solved for crime reporting purposes, a slight increase from 545 in 2017. There is no other formal mechanism for the federal government to track prosecutions at the state and local levels.

The government took actions to address alleged complicity in human trafficking by government employees. Two active duty military officers were charged with sex trafficking. A U.S. naval officer was found guilty of sex trafficking. A municipal law enforcement officer was sentenced to 14 years in federal prison for sex trafficking involving two children.

The U.S. government continued to build the capacity of law enforcement, judges, military personnel, and labor inspectors, among others, to more effectively respond to human trafficking cases. DOJ conducted new training for law enforcement and financial units on asset forfeiture, restitution, and how money laundering and financial charges can enhance human trafficking prosecutions. DOJ, in coordination with an international association of police chiefs, developed and implemented training to increase investigative and prosecutorial capacity to address labor trafficking. DOJ also funded the delivery of new training to state and local practitioners on effective strategies to investigate and prosecute labor trafficking. In October 2019, DOJ held a workshop for federal human trafficking prosecutors in which survivors provided training on victim-centered, trauma-informed approaches to law enforcement. DOJ also released a series of web-based trainings for prosecutors that featured survivor experts training on victim-centered approaches. DHS launched new introductory-level human trafficking awareness training for 110 federal, state, local, tribal, and territorial law enforcement officers in FY 2019. DHS also trained more than 2,800 federal law enforcement officers on human trafficking indicators in its federal training centers’ basic training programs and trained foreign law enforcement, prosecutors, and victim service providers from 50 countries. DoD requires all its investigative professionals to take training on human trafficking investigations. DoD integrated trafficking in persons into its joint exercises and trainings for more than 2,100 foreign personnel and military members from 110 partner countries. The Department of the Interior (DOI) provided training to about 900 of its law enforcement officers, first responders, contracting officers, as well as other federal, state, tribal, and local organizations on human trafficking. State trained its agents and analysts who investigate and support human trafficking cases to identify networks and engage with survivors using a victim-centered approach. In 2019, State’s six international law enforcement training facilities hosted 11 courses on trafficking in persons and child exploitation, developing nearly 400 contacts from 24 countries. State also trained more than 8,200 foreign law enforcement and immigration counterparts through other programs.

One NGO called for more training on trauma-informed care during the criminal justice process to avoid retraumatizing victims who choose to testify against their trafficker. Survivor advocates called on the government to ensure law enforcement trainings, including on labor trafficking investigations and cultural sensitivity, are developed in consultation with survivor leaders.

PROTECTION

The government decreased protection efforts. While the government increased funding for victim assistance for trafficking victims from the previous year, the number of victims served decreased. The number of victims granted T nonimmigrant status also decreased, and the government granted fewer Certification Letters providing access to benefits and services to foreign national adult victims of trafficking.

The government had formal procedures to guide officials in victim identification and referral to service providers; funded several federal tip lines, including an NGO-operated national hotline and referral service; and funded victim assistance organizations that provided trafficking-specific services. Comprehensive victim assistance funded by the federal government includes case management and referrals for medical and dental care, mental health and substance use disorder treatment, sustenance and shelter, translation and interpretation services, immigration and legal assistance, employment and training, transportation assistance, and other services.

DOJ provided funding for victim-centered services for both foreign national and domestic trafficking victims. Record-keeping systems used by DOJ and HHS did not allow for cross-referencing to determine which victims were served by both agencies. HHS issued Certification and Eligibility Letters to foreign national victims of severe forms of trafficking to be eligible to apply for benefits and services to the same extent as refugees, provided grant funding for comprehensive case management for foreign national and domestic trafficking victims, and funded capacity-building grants for community-based organizations and child welfare systems to respond to trafficking.

During FY 2019, DOJ provided $42.9 million for 65 victim service providers offering comprehensive and specialized services across the United States. This represents a significant increase from 45 providers receiving $31.2 million in FY 2018. In addition, DOJ provided new funding to support several different initiatives: for specialized services for child victims of trafficking ($15.5 million), for filling gaps and improving the victim services field’s response to human trafficking ($4.4 million), and for training and technical assistance to improve services offered to labor trafficking victims nationwide ($1 million). DOJ also provided $4.7 million to support specialized services and mentoring for child and youth victims of sex trafficking and sexual exploitation, compared to $1.8 million in FY 2018. DOJ grantees providing victim services reported from July 1, 2018, to June 30, 2019, 8,375 open trafficking client cases, a decrease from 8,913 open client cases the previous year. Of these open client cases, 5,090 were new clients, an increase from 4,739 new clients reported the previous year. DOJ’s grantees reported 62 percent of clients served during the reporting period were U.S. citizens or lawful permanent residents, 35 percent were foreign nationals, and the citizenship for two percent was unknown. Grantees reported 62 percent of clients served were victims of sex trafficking, 22 percent were victims of labor trafficking, seven percent were identified as victims of both sex and labor trafficking, and the form of trafficking for nine percent was unknown. In March 2020, DOJ released its FY 2020 funding opportunities, which did not include a restriction on the use of victim assistance funding to represent survivors in vacatur and expungement cases.

During the reporting period, the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) postponed a $13.5 million grant program (with funding transferred to HUD by DOJ in FY 2017) for specialized housing and services for survivors of human trafficking. The funding was transferred back to DOJ, which released a new housing funding opportunity in December 2019. In February 2020, the government convened government and civil society experts on legal aid to discuss best practices for providing legal services to victims of human trafficking, including ways to ensure restitution is paid to victims.

HHS awarded $10.9 million in FY 2019 for the provision of case management services to foreign national victims through a nationwide network of NGO sub-recipients, an increase from $7.5 million in FY 2018. Through this program, HHS supported 82 NGOs that served 1,573 individuals, including 968 victims of trafficking and 605 qualified family members in 48 states and U.S. territories, a decrease from 1,612 individuals served from the previous year. HHS’s grantees reported 68 percent of clients served were victims of labor trafficking, 20 percent were victims of sex trafficking, and 12 percent were identified as victims of both sex and labor trafficking. HHS continued to fund the provision of case management services to domestic victims of human trafficking, which served 825 victims of trafficking in 12 states through collaborative partnerships with 169 service providers, a significant decrease from 1,149 individuals served the previous year. HHS’s grantees reported 87 percent of clients served were victims of sex trafficking, two percent were victims of labor trafficking, two percent were identified as victims of both sex and labor trafficking, and the form of trafficking for nine percent was unknown. HHS also provided $2.3 million to address human trafficking in the child welfare system in FY 2019, the same amount as FY 2018. In FY 2019, HHS also provided $7 million in matching funds through title IV-E of the Social Security Act for administrative activities to serve any child or youth in the placement, care, or supervision of a foster care agency who is at risk of becoming a sex trafficking victim, identified as a sex trafficking victim, or missing from foster care, an increase from $6.7 million in FY 2018.

A Certification Letter enables foreign national adult victims of severe forms of trafficking in persons to be eligible to apply for benefits and services to the same extent as refugees when DHS issues Continued Presence or when a victim has a bona fide or approved application for T nonimmigrant status, as described further below. An Eligibility or Interim Assistance Letter enables foreign national children to apply for benefits and services to the same extent as refugees. HHS issues such letters when the Department receives credible information the child is or may be a victim of a severe form of trafficking in persons under the TVPA. HHS issued 311 Certification Letters to foreign national adults in FY 2019, representing a significant decrease from 412 in FY 2018, and issued 892 Eligibility Letters to foreign national children in FY 2019, representing a significant increase from 466 in FY 2018. Of the 311 foreign national adult victims certified in FY 2019, 211 were labor trafficking victims, 67 were sex trafficking victims, 22 were victims of both sex and labor trafficking, and 11 cases were unknown. More than half of all adult victims certified in FY 2019 were female. Out of 892 foreign national child victims certified in FY 2019, 614 were labor trafficking victims, 251 were sex trafficking victims, and 27 were victims of both labor and sex trafficking. Slightly more than half of all foreign national child victims were male.

When foreign national children are placed in the care and custody of HHS, they are screened for human trafficking. When appropriate, HHS makes a determination of eligibility for benefits and services, which may include long-term assistance. In FY 2019, HHS assisted 228 foreign national child victims of trafficking, including 69 new enrollments, through its Unaccompanied Refugee Minors Program, compared to 199 foreign national child victims of trafficking, including 87 new enrollments in FY 2018. This program requires states to provide such child victims with the same assistance, care, and services available to foster children.

NGOs continued to call for expanded services, including legal services, for unaccompanied foreign national children without lawful immigration status upon their release from HHS care and custody.

Advocates reported a lack of services available for men, boys, LGBTI individuals, and labor trafficking survivors. Advocates also reported a need for increased access to affordable and trauma-informed health care and mental health services, including services available to a victim’s family. NGOs and survivor advocates continued to report insufficient access to housing, including transitional housing and long-term housing options for trafficking victims. Advocates called for more culturally competent and inclusive services, including language access, and increased availability of victim-centered, trauma-informed, and survivor-informed services for trafficking victims. Survivor advocates reported a lack of specialized services for American Indians and Alaska Natives, individuals with disabilities, and the elderly. Advocates also called for improvements to education services, including financial education and resources, job training, and job placement for survivors, as well as increased access to trauma-informed childcare.

DHS provides immigration options specifically for victims of trafficking through Continued Presence, which is a temporary immigration designation, and T nonimmigrant status, which is a temporary immigration benefit commonly referred to as the T visa. Both immigration options strengthen the ability of law enforcement agencies to investigate and prosecute human trafficking by encouraging victims to engage and cooperate with law enforcement regardless of their immigration status. To qualify for Continued Presence, an individual must be identified by law enforcement as a victim of human trafficking who may be a potential witness in the investigation or prosecution of the trafficker. To qualify for a T visa, an applicant must demonstrate that they (1) are a victim of a severe form of trafficking in persons; (2) are physically present in the United States, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, or at a port of entry on account of trafficking; (3) have complied with reasonable requests from law enforcement, unless they are younger than the age of 18 or unable to cooperate due to trauma suffered; and (4) would suffer extreme hardship involving unusual and severe harm upon removal from the United States. T visa applicants may sponsor certain family members, including certain extended family members who face a present danger of retaliation. T nonimmigrants and their derivative family members are authorized to work and are eligible for certain federal public benefits and services. T nonimmigrant status is granted for a period of four years and may be extended under certain limited circumstances. After three years, or upon the completion of the investigation or prosecution, T nonimmigrants may be eligible to apply for lawful permanent resident status and eventually may be eligible for citizenship. DHS granted T nonimmigrant status to 500 victims in FY 2019, a decrease from 576 victims in FY 2018, and granted T nonimmigrant status to 491 eligible family members of victims in FY 2019, compared to 703 family members in FY 2018. (The FY 2018 number of T nonimmigrant status (576) represents a correction to the number cited last year (580); the FY 2018 number of eligible family members (703) represents a correction to the number cited last year (698).) The processing time for T visas was between 19.5 months to 26.5 months in FY 2019, an increase from 16 months to 23.5 months in FY 2018. In March 2020, DHS announced it would enforce current regulations and form instructions and would reject forms where required fields are left blank or incomplete (and allow applicants to resubmit applications). In July 2019, DOL amended its policy of certifying applications for T visas, which now requires a referral to criminal law enforcement prior to DOL certification.

Advocates again reported increased obstacles to obtaining a T visa. Advocates noted a continuing rise in the number of requests for additional evidence by adjudicators, which tends to increase processing times, and reported increased T visa denials that they believed improperly interpreted relevant statutes and regulations, such as denials based on unlawful acts traffickers compelled victims to commit or narrower interpretations of the physical presence requirement. Some NGOs reported DHS denied T visa applications involving polyvictimization, such as when an application detailed an experience of domestic violence or smuggling in addition to human trafficking. NGOs continued to call for DHS to improve training for adjudicators that includes detailed guidance on current regulations, a trauma-informed approach, and instructions for drafting victim-centered requests for additional evidence developed with input from survivors. Advocates expressed concern with lengthy and increasing T visa processing times, citing added vulnerabilities for survivors who lack legal status or whose time-limited support services expire. NGOs also noted the amended DOL certification policy creates additional barriers to obtaining a T visa and may deter victims from coming forward.

DHS manages all requests from federal, state, and local law enforcement for Continued Presence, authorizing foreign nationals identified by law enforcement as trafficking victims who may be potential witnesses to remain lawfully and work in the United States during the investigation and prosecution of the crime. In FY 2019, DHS issued Continued Presence to 125 trafficking victims, who were potential witnesses, compared to 121 in FY 2018. DHS granted 48 extensions of Continued Presence, compared to 31
In FY 2018, DHS updated its Continued Presence brochure and publicly released Continued Presence training videos to promote consistent messaging that encourages federal, state, and local law enforcement requests and provide clarification that applications should be submitted immediately upon identification of a victim.

Advocates reported continued concern with the low number of Continued Presence requests made by law enforcement and called for enhanced collaboration between DHS and DOJ to prioritize an increase in the number of requests submitted by federal law enforcement working on cases in the field. NGOs also called for targeted training of law enforcement in geographic areas with the lowest numbers of requests and for granting federal victim assistance specialists the authority to request Continued Presence. NGOs reported survivors of sex trafficking were more likely to obtain Continued Presence than survivors of labor trafficking.

DHS issued a new notice of proposed rulemaking in November 2019 that would change its fee waiver determination process for certain immigration applications and petitions, including filings related to the T visa. However, under this rulemaking, applications for T nonimmigrant status would remain fee-exempt, and applicants would still be permitted to seek a fee waiver for related filings if their household income is at or below 125 percent of the federal poverty guidelines, a change from 150 percent.

In February 2020, DHS implemented a final rule that amended regulations used to determine an applicant’s inadmissibility to the United States based on the likelihood of becoming a public charge (i.e., depending on public resources for basic needs). Applicants for T visas, certain T nonimmigrants seeking to adjust status, petitioners for U visas, and U nonimmigrants seeking to adjust status are exempt from the public charge ground of inadmissibility. To align with this DHS rule, State implemented a similar new rule for applicants of immigrant and nonimmigrant visas outside the United States.

Advocates continued to report an increasing number of foreign national survivors are afraid to report their cases to law enforcement, pursue immigration options, or seek services due to heightened immigration enforcement policies and increased fear of removing victim witnesses from the United States. Advocates called for the reversal of the policy DHS implemented in November 2018 to allow notices to appear to be issued to individuals denied T visas and who are removable upon denial, thus initiating removal proceedings with the immigration court. Advocates further stated the policy undermines the intent of the TVPA to safeguard victims of trafficking. Advocates expressed concern with DHS’s proposed revisions to the fee waiver determination process impeding access to immigration benefits, noting the TVPA permits survivors to apply for a waiver. Advocates also continued to report increased denials of fee waivers for T visa applicants, which placed a heightened financial burden on survivors, and reported increasing requests for greater proof of financial hardship. NGOs called for DHS and State to rescind the new policy revision regarding admissibility on public charge grounds. NGOs reported that, as a result of the rule, survivors are afraid to access public assistance programs to which they are entitled and their clients were withdrawing from or choosing not to enroll in programs.

Another immigration benefit available to certain human trafficking victims is U nonimmigrant status (commonly referred to as the U visa) for victims of certain qualifying crimes, including human trafficking, who are helpful in the investigation or prosecution of the qualifying criminal activity and meet other specific eligibility requirements. While DHS has conducted an analysis on a random sample of U visa petitions, it is unable to accurately track the number of U visas issued based on the specific underlying crimes for which they were issued. In December 2019, pursuant to current regulations and form instructions, DHS implemented new U visa receipt changes that reject any application if required fields in the form are left blank.

NGOs and media reports raised concern with this change, reporting increased obstacles to obtaining U visas.

In FY 2019, a State program reunified 204 family members with identified victims of trafficking in the United States, a significant decrease from 262 in FY 2018. This program assisted one survivor to return home.

The U.S. government continued to provide and fund training to federal, state, local, and tribal officials, as well as to NGO service providers and health and human service providers, to encourage more consistent application of victim-centered and trauma-informed approaches in all phases of victim identification, assistance, recovery, and participation in the criminal justice process. In FY 2019, HHS provided training and technical assistance to more than 25,000 health and human service professionals and expanded its online training program to more than one million health care providers. DOJ’s specialized training and technical assistance providers assisted organizations in strengthening their anti-trafficking responses related to housing, employment, legal services, trauma-informed care, courts, and investigations and prosecutions. DOJ also funded a new initiative in FY 2019 to invest in organizations to build capacity, navigate resources, and strengthen networks to serve victims of all forms of human trafficking.

DHS screens certain individuals for human trafficking, including unaccompanied foreign national children without lawful immigration status and some detained individuals, and, in cases where potential victims were identified, referred cases to law enforcement for further investigation. In the case of foreign national adults apprehended, interdicted, or in detention pending removal from the United States, DHS does not mandate screening of such individuals for trafficking indicators.

Advocates called for DHS to conduct human trafficking screening for foreign national adults and accompanied foreign national children, citing concerns that potential victims who would otherwise be eligible for relief could be removed from the United States. Advocates also reported concerns that trafficking survivors are held in immigration detention, with one NGO identifying at least five victims in detention. One NGO report noted the government removed some individuals with pending applications for trafficking-specific immigration benefits or pending appeals for such benefits. A state government and a group of NGOs each filed a lawsuit challenging the DHS practice of conducting federal immigration arrests in and around state courthouses without judicial warrants, including of human trafficking victims. The lawsuits, as well as an NGO report released during the reporting period, claim the arrests are increasing and have deterred victims from appearing in court or assisting law enforcement in cases, bolstering traffickers’ ability to use the threat of removal from the United States to control victims.

One NGO called for standardized trafficking screening within the judicial and penal system to identify potential victims, especially child victims. Advocates continued to report that survivors with criminal records resulting from unlawful acts their traffickers compelled them to commit often remain excluded from employment, housing, and higher education; are ineligible for government programs; and face difficulties meeting needs essential to their safety and recovery. Advocates also noted the need for better trafficking screening of individuals with disabilities to improve the identification of potential victims.
PREVENTION
The U.S. government increased efforts to prevent trafficking. Federal agencies conducted numerous educational and training activities for their own personnel, state, local, and tribal officials, and other stakeholders. During the reporting period, the president signed an executive order that included the creation of a position within the Executive Office of the President focused on human trafficking and directed the federal government to improve prevalence estimate methodologies and law enforcement coordination. The U.S. Congress added the Department of Commerce to the President’s Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (PITF). To enhance transparency and stakeholder input, the PITF reported on agency accomplishments and future efforts and again invited members of the presidentially appointed survivor advisory council to join its meeting.

The government continued public outreach measures on the causes and consequences of human trafficking and continued efforts to increase victim identification among vulnerable populations and sectors and to seek and incorporate survivor input into policies and programs. HHS continued to fund an NGO to operate the national human trafficking hotline. In FY 2019, the hotline received 136,990 calls, texts, chats, online tips, and emails, identified 11,852 potential human trafficking cases, and provided resources and referrals to 3,828 potential victims. The hotline also received information on 4,692 potential traffickers and 1,849 types of businesses facilitating human trafficking. Of the potential human trafficking cases identified, the hotline reported 3,599 potential cases to law enforcement and received information that at least 1,086 investigations were opened as a result. More than 10,300 signals, which includes calls, texts, and web chats, came from individuals who identified themselves as potential victims of trafficking seeking help, with calls being the most common method of communication. The U.S. government operated other tip lines that received calls or messages related to suspected human trafficking cases. U.S. embassies and consulates worldwide continued to provide the “Know Your Rights” pamphlet to applicants for temporary work and exchange visitor visas and play a related video in certain consular waiting rooms in an effort to help visa applicants better understand their rights and raise awareness of human trafficking. In FY 2019, the pamphlet generated 156 signals to the national hotline, a decrease from 294 calls generated in FY 2018.

In 2020, DHS published its first strategy to combat human trafficking, the importation of goods produced with forced labor, and child sexual exploitation. In FY 2019, DHS law enforcement held more than 1,350 training and engagement events, and DHS continued its nationwide human trafficking awareness Blue Campaign, which held 10 training and outreach engagements with NGOs and law enforcement. In FY 2019, HHS supported 93 training and technical assistance activities, compared to 61 in FY 2018, reaching 5,090 training participants. HHS also developed human trafficking prevention resources and training tailored for programs that serve families and at-risk youth. For the third year, HHS continued its leadership academy composed of survivors and anti-trafficking professionals that developed recommendations for improving services focusing on two-generation, whole-family approaches to prevention. The Department of Transportation (DOT) and HHS continued to train aviation personnel and, in FY 2019, formed six new partnerships with airlines and aviation industry organizations for a total of 25 partners. The DOT advisory committee on human trafficking, composed of representatives from transportation sectors, labor associations, NGOs, and law enforcement, submitted its final report with recommendations for DOT and best practices for the state and local departments of transportation, private industry, NGOs, transportation authorities, and other transportation stakeholders. During the reporting period, DOT’s initiative of transportation leaders aligned against human trafficking secured 413 pledges from leaders representing airports and air carriers; urban and rural transit agencies; trucking, bus, and rail companies; ports; state departments of transportation; and modal associations. DOT also launched a new grant award to incentivize the development of innovative solutions that increase human trafficking prevention efforts among transportation stakeholders; awarded more than $430,000 in grants to support state efforts through driver’s license standards and programs; and committed $5.4 million in grants to address public safety, including human trafficking. DOJ released a new public online training series on trauma-informed and victim-centered approaches to human trafficking, and DOJ grantees reported providing training to more than 82,000 anti-trafficking partners and stakeholders. In FY 2019, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) participated in 188 outreach events that addressed human trafficking, reaching more than 11,200 individuals, and continued efforts to increase public awareness about human trafficking with its human trafficking resource guide. The EEOC also conducted 57 training sessions for EEOC staff and the staff of state and local partners on identifying and developing trafficking-related charges of discrimination and trauma-informed investigative techniques. The Department of Education developed a department-wide plan to combat human trafficking, including activities to increase awareness and to promote the prevention of human trafficking in the education community, with special emphasis on the most vulnerable student populations and strategies for successfully reintegrating trafficking survivors. In April 2019, State worked with an NGO to launch a new set of targeted online risk-management tools for food and beverage companies to address forced labor in their global supply chains. Congress made available more than $92 million in FY 2019 foreign assistance resources to State and the U.S. Agency for International Development to support anti-trafficking initiatives in more than 50 countries.

Advocates continued to call for a more comprehensive and proactive approach to address the factors and conditions that increase vulnerabilities, including ensuring government requirements and regulations maintain protections and resources dedicated to reducing vulnerabilities among communities at higher risk for human trafficking, partnering with community-based providers to develop early intervention responses to communities’ needs, and better tailoring education and prevention programs to underserved or at-risk populations.

DOL, DHS, and State screen and approve employers and workers for temporary worker programs to ensure compliance with program requirements, including worker protections. To reduce workers’ vulnerability to exploitation, including human trafficking, the United States bars employers participating in these programs or their agents from seeking or receiving payments from workers for any activities related to obtaining labor certification or employment. These include job placement and recruitment fees, and salary and wage deductions, and requires that the terms of employment be disclosed. DOL seeks to ensure employer compliance through audits and investigations and does not accept temporary labor certification applications if the employer discloses it charges a prohibited fee to the worker.

NGOs reported weak oversight of employment-based and other nonimmigrant visa programs, noting human trafficking cases involving workers in the United States on these programs. Advocates continued to call for enhanced protections for workers in temporary worker programs, including regulatory changes to uncouple employment visas from an employer or sponsor, and to protect individuals in certain temporary worker programs to the same extent as other workers. In addition, advocates continued to call for increased transparency and accountability for temporary worker programs and for agencies to develop a more accessible system to share visa applications and job-related information with workers in real time, including the names of employer petitioners.

In FY 2019, DOL signed bilateral cooperative agreements regarding the H-2 programs with Honduras and Guatemala that requires those countries to begin performing labor recruitment directly or to create a registered foreign labor recruiter monitoring program. These agreements aim to increase transparency, accountability, and safeguards for temporary workers in the H-2 programs, including protection from labor recruitment practices that heighten workers’ vulnerability to exploitation.

NGOs continued to report formal and informal recruiters, labor contractors, and agents charged workers prohibited fees and noted weak government enforcement of the recruitment fee ban. Advocates called on the government to require employers furnish information regarding the services their foreign labor contractors and subcontractors provide commercially, including the cost of the services and who is responsible for payment. Advocates reported employers commonly and intentionally remain uninformed about the recruitment process to escape culpability for any payment of prohibited fees by workers. With regard to DOL’s certification of U.S.-based farm labor contractors, where U.S. law requires DOL to exclude contractors convicted for certain felonies within the last five years, one NGO stated the statutory screening and eligibility criteria were not sufficient, citing examples of farm labor contractors convicted or sued for labor trafficking violations that remained certified.

Advocates noted the government’s practice of denying visas to applicants who reported paying recruitment fees, combined with the risk of retaliation or blacklisting by employers and recruiters, disincentivized applicants from reporting violations to authorities and allowed unscrupulous employers and recruiters to continue operating without penalty. Advocates called for the government to provide protections for workers who report paying such fees or experience other prohibited employment or recruitment practices.

State continued its oversight of the Exchange Visitor Program (EVP or J-1 visa program), which includes the Summer Work Travel (SWT), Camp Counselor, Intern, and Au Pair programs. State continued to monitor exchange visitors to help safeguard their health, safety, and welfare and to identify and investigate program fraud and abuse. State conducted outreach throughout 2019 to raise program sponsors’ awareness of their administrative oversight and reporting obligations to State with respect to the health, safety, and welfare of exchange visitors. State requires EVP sponsors to provide all exchange visitors with the “Know Your Rights” pamphlet during orientation sessions. State conducted field monitoring across all EVP categories in 2019, visiting 1,529 exchange visitors in 364 sites in 24 states, the District of Columbia, and the U.S. Virgin Islands and enhanced its virtual outreach to SWT exchange visitors. State also supported community outreach efforts in 23 states with significant SWT populations, which included outreach with local host organizations and exchange visitors to raise awareness about human trafficking. State continued to liaise with law enforcement on criminal investigations relating to the EVP.

NGOs continued to report the need for additional steps to reduce the risks of exploitation in the SWT and au pair programs, noting concerns with exorbitant program fees and exploitative work conditions. NGOs called for further reforms of the SWT program to increase protections under U.S. labor and employment laws with oversight by DOL, stricter regulations over the recruitment of participants, and greater transparency about employers and occupations.

In April 2019, in accordance with the TVPA, State suspended the A-3 visa sponsorship privileges afforded to Malawi bilateral mission members because of an unpaid final judgment for approximately $1.1 million rendered by a federal district court in a civil human trafficking case. State continued to administer its domestic worker In-person Registration Program for A-3 and G-5 visa holders employed by foreign mission and international organization personnel, respectively, in the Washington, D.C. area. State expanded the program to the New York metropolitan area and Houston, Texas, and announced the program’s expansion to Los Angeles and San Francisco, California. State launched an In-person Registration Program for domestic workers employed by members of the UN Permanent Mission community and announced the program’s expansion to cover domestic workers employed by UN personnel.

During the reporting period, lawsuits in Colorado, Georgia, Texas, Washington, Maryland, and California remained pending against privately owned and operated detention facilities contracted by DHS. These lawsuits allege the contractors forced immigration detainees to work in violation of the TVPA during their federal immigration detention. DHS is not party to the lawsuits, nor are any of its component agencies.

NGOs stated the government should address the allegations of forced labor in immigration detention facilities.

Civil enforcement of federal laws continued to be a significant component of the government’s anti-trafficking efforts. DOL investigated complaints and conducted targeted civil labor investigations involving workers in industries and sectors known to be vulnerable to labor trafficking. In FY 2019, DOL continued enforcement activities in industries including agriculture, construction, landscaping, hotels, restaurants, seafood, and reforestation. In FY 2019, DOL made or received 20 referrals to federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies or task forces regarding allegations of human trafficking, including three cases referred to DOL, six requests for DOL assistance, and nine cases referred to other law enforcement agencies. To enhance DOL field staff’s ability to detect and refer potential human trafficking cases to law enforcement, DOL piloted initiatives to raise awareness of human trafficking through advanced human trafficking training, coordinated enforcement, and participation in local task forces.

NGOs reported a significant reduction in DOL investigations into workplaces due to insufficient resources, which inhibits meaningful or systematic enforcement of labor laws and detection of forced labor in industry supply chains. Survivor advocates called for more resources to be allocated to DOL to enhance efforts to identify labor trafficking cases.

During the reporting period, the EEOC, which enforces federal employment discrimination statutes, continued to investigate charges on behalf of and seek compensation for victims of trafficking. In FY 2019, the EEOC received six new charges of discrimination linked to human trafficking compared to eight in FY 2018. It recovered $56,000 in monetary benefits for charging parties through the administrative process, compared to $244,000 in FY 2018. As of September 30, 2019, the EEOC had six pending charges linked to human trafficking.

Federal law also allows a trafficking victim to independently file a civil cause of action, and there were cases in which individuals filed and successfully pursued civil causes of action during the reporting period.

The government made efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts, including by prosecuting individuals for sex trafficking who pay or attempt to pay for commercial sex involving children. In March 2019, DOJ issued departmental guidance on emphasizing that individuals who knowingly patronize or solicit sex trafficking victims are guilty of a federal crime and ordered DOJ components to continue to identify and prosecute individuals involved in sex trafficking. DOJ also provided training on demand reduction for federal prosecutors. DoD, in partnership with local law enforcement, continued to investigate cases of service members allegedly violating DoD’s prohibition on procuring commercial sex.

NGOs continued to call for increased efforts to address the demand for commercial sex in order to address human trafficking comprehensively, including calls for increased education and awareness for potential buyers and efforts to prevent child sex trafficking.

The government proactively investigated allegations of child sexual exploitation offenses perpetrated overseas by U.S. citizens and partnered with foreign law enforcement counterparts to share information regarding international travel of registered child sex offenders. In FY 2019, DHS launched a new center to improve its ability to notify countries of the potential travel of registered child sex offenders. Eleven defendants were convicted of federal child sex tourism charges in FY 2019, compared to three in the previous reporting period. Offenders who abuse children abroad may have been prosecuted under other statutes, and prosecutions based on other statutes are not reflected in this statistic.

DoJ and other federal law enforcement agencies received one allegation of forced labor or recruitment fees required of third-country nationals working on certain U.S. government contracts abroad. There were no federal criminal prosecutions of employers or labor contractors for such violations in connection with U.S. government contracts abroad in FY 2019.

The Office of Management and Budget finalized its guidance on anti-trafficking risk management best practices and mitigation considerations, which enhances the effectiveness of anti-trafficking requirements in federal acquisition and helps contractors manage and reduce the burden associated with meeting these responsibilities. DoD requires its acquisition personnel to take human trafficking training once every three years. In FY 2019, DoD updated its instruction that outlines the anti-trafficking roles and responsibilities for DoD components, services, and agencies. In FY 2019, DoD reported investigating 13 forced labor or related cases, compared to 23 cases in FY 2018, and took action against noncompliant employers or labor contractors from U.S. programs resulting in six non-compliance requests. In addition to the six non-compliance requests, five cases remained pending, one was unsubstantiated, and one was resolved through corrective actions by the company. Where appropriate, DoD refers these cases for criminal investigation or pursues criminal investigations for these cases.

An inspector general report released within the reporting period found DoD officials did not consistently enforce regulations on the identification and oversight of trafficking in persons in Kuwait, and DoD contracting personnel did not always ensure contracts in Kuwait complied with federal acquisition regulations on human trafficking. Upon release of the report, DoD took steps to implement the recommendations to improve enforcement and oversight, including updating a combatant command’s human trafficking regulation.

DHS enforced the law that prohibits the importation of goods mined, produced, or manufactured, wholly or in part, under forced labor conditions, including forced child labor. DHS received 53 allegations and issued six Withhold Release Orders within the reporting period for shipments of goods on grounds they were produced by forced labor, resulting in the detention of more than $15 million in goods, compared to two Withhold Release Orders within the previous reporting period. The government continued to enforce a law that extends this prohibition to any imports produced by North Korean nationals. DOJ continued to engage in extensive interagency consultations to clarify legal and jurisdictional challenges to addressing forced labor in fishing in international waters. The U.S. Congress ratified a trade agreement that requires the parties to prohibit the importation of goods produced by forced labor. DOL announced $27.2 million in new grants to help Mexico meet its labor obligations under the trade agreement, including the enforcement of its labor laws and addressing child labor and forced labor in its supply chains. In October 2019, the United States Trade Representative suspended trade preferences for Thailand based on its failure to protect workers, including from forced labor.

NGOs called for the federal government to enact a supply chains transparency law that would establish a registry of businesses and require disclosure of supply chain statements, among other measures. One NGO called on DHS to issue more guidance for the evidentiary standards it relies upon when issuing Withhold Release Orders to ensure those seeking to bring forward allegations include the necessary information.

In FY 2019, HHS held four regional American Indian and Alaska Native consultation sessions to discuss how to better prevent human trafficking within those communities. HHS also launched online training to educate health care providers serving American Indians, Alaska Natives, Native Hawaiians, and Pacific Islanders regarding human trafficking and its impact on their communities. For the second year, HHS provided funding for an NGO-run hotline for American Indians and Alaska Natives affected by domestic and dating violence, as well as human trafficking. In FY 2019, this hotline received 803 calls, chats, and text messages reporting sex trafficking and forced labor. In FY 2019, DOI delivered awareness training to more than 12,000 DOI employees, as well as tribal and state victim and social service providers, tribal council members, and tribal community members. DOI and HHS held a listening session with American Indian and Alaska Native representatives, where topics included human trafficking. HHS developed resources and engaged tribal and Native youth on the impact of human trafficking on indigenous communities and how cultural practices such as storytelling can raise awareness of trafficking. DOI provided technical assistance funding to increase its grantees’ capacity to respond to sex trafficking, including safety planning for victims, developing interagency cooperation in responding to sex trafficking, and expanding service providers’ understanding of trafficking involving Native women and children. DOI also trained American Indian and Alaska Native law enforcement to better understand and investigate child sex trafficking cases. DOI awarded $550,000 to increase services for urban American Indian and Alaska Native victims of sex trafficking.

U.S. INSULAR AREAS

Trafficking in persons occurs in the U.S. insular areas, including American Samoa, Guam, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands (CNMI), Puerto Rico, and the U.S. Virgin Islands (USVI).

In Guam and CNMI, members of DOJ-led human trafficking task forces continued to engage with community partners to provide victim services, train law enforcement, and share strategies for improving victim identification. DOJ also continued to advance an initiative that enhances coordination with stakeholders in the Pacific Region on victim services, law enforcement responses, training, community outreach, and prevention programs. DOJ and DHS held public awareness events in USVI and continued to participate, along with local authorities in Puerto Rico, in the crimes against children task force. DOJ developed human trafficking training for prosecutors, law enforcement officers, and service providers within USVI.

HHS provides comprehensive case management services to foreign national victims of trafficking in American Samoa, Guam, CNMI, Puerto Rico, and USVI, and two DOJ grantees provided comprehensive and legal services to victims of all forms of trafficking in CNMI during the reporting period. In FY 2019, HHS provided grant-funded training and technical assistance in Guam and CNMI to improve the health and safety outcomes for survivors of human trafficking and intimate partner violence and to promote human trafficking prevention. In FY 2019, DOJ provided training and technical assistance to support the development of multidisciplinary anti-trafficking task forces in Puerto Rico, USVI, and American Samoa. In FY 2019, HHS conducted a site visit in Guam and CNMI to better understand the unique challenges and requirements related to combating human trafficking in the region. In response, HHS issued grantee guidance clarifying that certain insular areas are eligible for grant-funded victim assistance programs.

As part of the prosecution statistics previously mentioned, DOJ filed four new human trafficking cases in Puerto Rico and USVI and convicted five defendants in Puerto Rico within the reporting period. Authorities pursued lesser charges in one federal case in USVI that contained elements of human trafficking, including victims being forced to work to repay debts, destruction of travel documents, and physical threats.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign national victims in the United States, and traffickers exploit victims from the United States abroad. Human trafficking cases have been reported in all 50 states and the District of Columbia. Traffickers compel victims to engage in commercial sex and to work in both legal and illicit industries and sectors, including in hospitality, traveling sales crews, agriculture, janitorial services, construction, landscaping, restaurants, factories, care for persons with disabilities, salon services, massage parlors, retail, fairs and carnivals, peddling and begging, drug smuggling and distribution, religious institutions, child care, and domestic work. Individuals who entered the United States with and without legal status have been identified as trafficking victims. Victims originate from almost every region of the world; the top three countries of origin of federally identified victims in FY 2019 were the United States, Mexico, and Honduras. Individuals in the United States vulnerable to human trafficking include: children in the child welfare and juvenile justice systems, including foster care; runaway and homeless youth; unaccompanied foreign national children without lawful immigration status; individuals seeking asylum; American Indians and Alaska Natives, particularly women and girls; individuals with substance use issues; migrant laborers, including undocumented workers and participants in visa programs for temporary workers; foreign national domestic workers in diplomatic households; persons with limited English proficiency; persons with disabilities; LGBTI individuals, and victims of intimate partner violence or domestic violence. Advocates reported a growing recognition of trauma bonding in human trafficking cases, which occurs when a trafficker uses rewards and punishments in cycles of abuse to foster a powerful emotional connection with the victim. Some U.S. citizens engage in child sex tourism in foreign countries.

URUGUAY: TIER 2

The Government of Uruguay does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Uruguay remained on Tier 2. These efforts include convicting eight traffickers, opening a new victim services center, and launching expanded public awareness campaigns. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. Law enforcement officials did not proactively and systematically identify victims, and the government did not have adequate victim services or provide consistent access to shelters. Despite increased convictions, efforts to prosecute traffickers remained insufficient. Some victims declined to participate in trials against their traffickers due to doubts about the government’s ability to ensure their safety.

URUGUAY TIER RANKING BY YEAR

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Provide adequate services and shelter for all victims, especially those outside the capital. • Increase training for law enforcement officials, labor inspectors, coast guard, prosecutors, judges, and social workers to proactively identify victims of sex and labor trafficking, particularly among foreign workers and individuals in commercial sex. • Allocate a dedicated anti-trafficking budget and increase funding for victim services. • Establish a facility accessible to victims while shelters are closed during the day. • Expand long-term and reintegration services, including vocational training. • Proactively screen foreign workers for trafficking indicators, including through inspections aboard foreign-flagged vessels in Uruguayan waters and docked at port. • Vigorously investigate and prosecute forced labor, forced commercial sex, and child sex trafficking. • Sentence convicted traffickers to adequate penalties, which should involve significant prison terms. • Reinforce the 2018 trafficking law by training judges, law enforcement officials, and prosecutors on the irrelevance of initial consent into prostitution, as well as non-physical coercion. • Revise the definition of trafficking under Uruguayan law to align with the definition in the 2000 UN TIP Protocol. • Consider legislation requiring foreign fishing vessels to register in country and abide by Uruguayan labor laws given reported indicators of forced labor. • Fund the implementation of the anti-trafficking law and the national action plan. • Ensure the safety of victims participating in trials against their traffickers as required by law and inform victims of available protective measures. • Operationalize a centralized database to systematize official statistics on anti-trafficking law enforcement and victim identification efforts. • Enhance international cooperation to investigate cases and protect foreign victims.

PROSECUTION
The government slightly increased prosecution efforts. Article 78 of the 2008 immigration law criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking, prescribing penalties of four to 16 years’ imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. The penalties were increased by one-third to one-half if the trafficking offense involved a child victim. Inconsistent with the definition of trafficking under international law, the law established the use of force, fraud, and coercion as aggravating factors rather than as essential elements of the crime.

The government did not collect comprehensive data on anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts and did not maintain a system for tracking court cases. In 2019, the government initiated 18 trafficking investigations—11 for sex trafficking and seven for labor trafficking—compared with 17 in 2018 and 10 in 2017. The government reported initiating four new prosecutions in 2019, compared to the same number in 2018 and 23 in 2017. There were two additional prosecutions for soliciting child sex trafficking victims. The government reported convicting eight traffickers, compared to zero in 2018. Over the previous six years, the government convicted five traffickers out of 43 investigations and 52 prosecutions. The government reported convicting two additional traffickers on pimping charges, but it was not clear if these cases met the definition of trafficking under international law. Judges sentenced three of the eight traffickers to 18 to 22 months’ imprisonment; the government did not report sentencing statistics for the other five convicted traffickers. In Montevideo, two gender-based violence units within the attorney general’s office focused on investigating and prosecuting crimes related to trafficking and the exploitation of children; there were no specialized units outside of the capital. Authorities did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government officials complicit in trafficking offenses. The government made limited efforts to train law enforcement officials responsible for victim identification and investigation; observers indicated law enforcement officials did not employ systematic procedures to identify victims proactively but displayed an improved understanding of the irrelevance of initial consent. Uruguayan law enforcement and officials cooperated with a foreign government in the arrest of an individual accused of purchasing commercial sex acts from a minor. The government offered some training to strengthen law enforcement and border officials’ capacity to identify victims.

PROTECTION
The government maintained protection efforts. In 2019, the Ministry of Social Development (MIDES) assisted 83 newly identified victims, most of whom were foreign nationals; it was unclear what agency identified these victims or how many were victims of sex trafficking versus forced labor. There were, by comparison, 95 victims identified in 2018. The National Institute for Children and Adolescents Affairs (INAU) reported monitoring 240 incidences of child sex trafficking but did not specify how many victims were involved or how many of these cases were new in 2019. The government had a variety of victim protection protocols and written referral mechanisms on assisting victims. MIDES was the principal provider of services for victims of all crimes, but specialized services for victims of trafficking did not exist in Uruguay. INAU was responsible for assisting child and adolescent victims. Civil society and government agencies worked together to provide services for female victims; however, the government provided services to LGBTI and male victims on a case-by-case basis, and some organizations expressed concern about the lack of formality in victim referral. The government had an interagency response system that established a referral mechanism for cases. The government and civil society continued to operate a 14-member mobile team of psychologists, social workers, and lawyers that responded to cases located in the interior of the country. During the reporting period, INAU established a program for up to 20 child and adolescent victims. MIDES inaugurated a second victim assistance center in 2019, where it provided services to 21 female victims during the reporting period. The Ministry of Health trained 2,500 health professionals on new protocols for treating potential victims of gender-based violence, including trafficking. The government provided venues, technical support, and allowed staff to attend trainings in victim identification and assistance conducted by an international organization.

The government contracted with NGOs to provide victims services similar to those given to other vulnerable populations, such as the homeless, refugees, and citizens on welfare; there were no specialized services for trafficking victims. Government officials had some facilities that could temporarily house victims; however, civil society expressed concerns about the suitability of these facilities, as they did not meet the needs of trafficking victims. Civil society reported challenges finding shelter for trafficking victims, particularly for those identified outside the capital. Observers identified a need for daytime facilities and programming for victims staying in overnight-only shelters. Civil society reported government services focused mostly on psycho-social and legal assistance, while long-term services, such as housing, vocational support, and job placement, were insufficient. The government did not report on its funding for victim protection and assistance. Although the government had a protocol to provide security and protection measures to victims, observers reported the government did not ensure victims’ physical safety, and fear of retaliation prevented victims from participating in trials against their traffickers. Victims could file civil suit to seek compensation from their traffickers, but the government did not report if any victims did so in 2019. Foreign victims were entitled to work permits and permanent residency status and had 180 days to decide whether to stay in the country, return to their country of origin, or resettle in a third country. However, the government did not report issuing residency permits to any foreign victims during the reporting period.

PREVENTION
The government slightly increased prevention efforts. The national trafficking council, composed of high-level participants and led by MIDES, and its working groups met regularly throughout the reporting period. The council was responsible for the implementation of recommendations from international organizations and institutional oversight on the implementation of law 19,643 and the 2018-2020 national action plan. The national trafficking council conducted an annual review of its anti-trafficking efforts, which it publicized during a World Day against Trafficking event. The government did not allocate funding to implement the trafficking law or the national action plan, and the trafficking council lacked an operational budget. The government distributed informational materials outlining how to identify and report trafficking to the public. Government agencies conducted awareness campaigns that reached more than 800 people via workshops, seminars, social media, print media, and radio broadcasts. The government operated a free, 24-hour hotline directing victims to police or MIDES; the government did not report how many calls involved trafficking cases. MIDES launched a cellphone app version of the hotline to promote its use among younger audiences. The Ministry of Labor’s inspectors received training to identify labor trafficking indicators and performed regular labor inspections, including in establishments known to facilitate commercial sex, but lacked specific procedures to identify trafficking. The government took initial steps to assess vulnerability to sex trafficking in communities near a new industrial complex and encouraged its developers to adopt an anti-trafficking code of ethics. The government made efforts to prevent child sex tourism but did not otherwise make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. The government and an NGO collaborated on an awareness campaign to prevent child sex tourism in tourism hotspots.
TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Uruguay, and traffickers exploit victims from Uruguay abroad. Uruguayan women and girls—and, to a more limited extent, transgender adults and male adolescents—are exploited in sex trafficking within the country. Traffickers force Uruguayan women and LGBTI individuals into commercial sex in Spain, Italy, Argentina, and Brazil. Traffickers exploit workers from Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, and, to a lesser extent, from South American countries, in sex trafficking in Uruguay. Foreign workers, mainly from Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Paraguay, and Argentina, are exploited in forced labor in construction, domestic service, cleaning services, elderly care, wholesale stores, textile industries, agriculture, fishing, and lumber processing. Sex traffickers exploited migrants from Cuba in border cities. Since 2013, an average of one dead crewmember per month has been associated with Taiwan- and Chinese-flagged fishing vessels docked at the Montevideo port and in Uruguay’s waters. Foreign workers aboard these vessels are subjected to abuses indicative of forced labor, including unpaid wages, confiscated identification, and physical abuse, and there are anecdotal reports of murder at sea. Citizens of other countries, including China and the Dominican Republic, may transit Uruguay en route to other destinations, particularly Argentina. Domestic workers employed in the less-monitored interior of the country are at greater risk of trafficking.

UZBEKISTAN: TIER 2 WATCH LIST
The Government of Uzbekistan does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. These efforts included steps to address the use of forced adult labor during the annual cotton harvest through increasing remuneration to those picking cotton and improving working conditions to attract voluntary workers. The government ceased the systemic mobilization of students, teachers, and health care workers during the 2019 harvest. The government continued to allow unimpeded access to international third-party monitors, who assessed a continued overall decrease in the number of Uzbek citizens forced to pick cotton, and incorporated independent human rights activists into monitoring plans. The government also committed to eliminate cotton picking quotas—a contributing factor to forced labor—beginning in the fall 2020 harvest. The government created a high-level National Commission on Trafficking, including all relevant state agencies, as well as regional commissions, chaired by the regional governor, in every area of the country. However, the government did not demonstrate overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period. There were continued reports of corrupt officials requiring public sector employees to pick cotton or pay for a replacement worker, creating a penalty for not participating in the cotton harvest and a lucrative means of extortion for these officials. The government investigated and prosecuted fewer suspected traffickers for the sixth consecutive year. Authorities identified fewer victims of trafficking and did not identify any foreign victims. Less than one third of all convictions carried a prison sentence. The government has not reported criminal proceedings against officials for compelling people to participate in cotton cultivation and harvesting. Because the government has devoted sufficient resources to a written plan that, if implemented, would constitute significant efforts to meet the minimum standards, Uzbekistan was granted a waiver per the Trafficking Victims Protection Act from an otherwise required downgrade to Tier 3. Therefore Uzbekistan remained on Tier 2 Watch List for the third consecutive year.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Continue substantive action to end all government-compelled forced labor and hold complicit officials accountable. • Continue efforts to ensure all citizens are aware of their “right to refuse” participation in the cotton harvest or other work outside their professional duties and the requirement to pay for replacement workers without suffering consequences. • Respect due process, increase investigations and, when sufficient evidence exists, criminally prosecute persons complicit in human trafficking, including officials involved in mobilizing forced labor. • Continue granting independent observers full access to monitor cotton cultivation and fully cease harassment, detention, and abuse of activists for documenting labor conditions; investigate and, when sufficient evidence exists, criminally prosecute persons complicit in human trafficking identified by observers. • Implement procedures for identifying trafficking victims to ensure they are systematic and proactive, including those developed with international partners. • Continue training law enforcement officials on proper handling of trafficking cases. • Train all first responders to officially identify potential trafficking victims and refer to care. • Continue implementing the national action plan for improving labor conditions in the agricultural sector. • Continue grants that fund anti-trafficking NGOs assisting and sheltering victims who were not admitted to the state-run shelter. • Adopt and implement draft mechanisms to ensure victims are not penalized for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, including for illegal border crossing and losing personal identification documents. • Adopt draft amendments to the criminal code to protect the identities of trafficking victims. • Encourage prosecutors to proactively seek victim restitution in criminal cases. • Monitor private employment agencies for recruitment fees and ensure they are paid by employers rather than prospective job applicants.

PROSECUTION
The government decreased the number of investigations, prosecutions, and convictions. Article 135 of the criminal code criminalized sex trafficking and labor trafficking and prescribed penalties of three to five years’ imprisonment for offenses involving an adult victim and eight to 12 years’ imprisonment for those involving a child victim, which were sufficiently stringent. However, with respect to sex trafficking, by allowing for house arrest in lieu of imprisonment, these penalties were not commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. Inconsistent with the definition of trafficking under international law, the law established the use of force, fraud, or coercion as aggravating factors rather than essential elements of the crime. Forced labor violations were criminalized in 2019 but considered as administrative violations for first offenses with increased fines levied by the labor inspectorate; only repeat offenses were considered criminal. The June 2019 Presidential decree “On Additional Measures to Further Improve the System of Combating Trafficking in Persons and Forced Labor” included a directive to align Article 135 more closely to international law; legislative changes remained in draft at the close of the reporting period.

The government provided more detailed law enforcement data compared to previous years. For the sixth consecutive
With the assistance of international partners, the government developed a draft law that includes provisions for the protection of victims of trafficking. Per Article 42 of the draft law, victims of human trafficking who committed actions subject to administrative or criminal liability under any form of coercion cannot be placed in a detention facility or jail during an administrative or criminal proceeding or during administrative or pre-trial investigation. International observers argued the government’s lack of SOPs for victim identification may have led to the penalization of potential victims, particularly of vulnerable populations, such as individuals in commercial sex and migrant workers. Current law did not exempt transnational sex and labor trafficking victims from facing a criminal penalty for illegally crossing the border, which deterred some victims from reporting their traffickers. Some victims initially faced a criminal penalty for illegally crossing the border, but NGOs reported authorities dropped these charges when NGOs proved to authorities the victims were subjected to human trafficking.

The June 2019 Presidential Decree mandated the establishment of a national referral mechanism, which it had been developing with international partners, but the government did not report its finalization or implementation. Police, consular officials, and border guards who were able to identify potential trafficking victims could refer them to either a state-run shelter or NGOs for services. The government reported it amended victim assistance protocols. In 2019, victims did not have to file a criminal complaint to receive government-provided rehabilitation and protection services; the government did not report the number of victims who received services without lodging a criminal complaint. NGOs reported local officials regularly referred victims who did not wish to pursue a criminal case to NGO offices for assistance.

The majority of identified victims were reluctant to contact or cooperate with law enforcement because of their distrust in authorities and fear for their safety or the safety of their families due to corruption in law enforcement agencies. Uzbekistan’s diplomatic missions abroad helped repatriate 51 victims, an increase from 15 victims in 2018, by issuing travel documents and working with an international organization to provide food, clothing, and transportation to victims to facilitate their repatriation to Uzbekistan. The government increased its support for its own citizens in Russia and South Korea by expanding

In 2019, the government allocated approximately 1.2 billion soum ($126,320), an increase from 475 million soum (approximately $50,000) in 2018, to operate its Tashkent-based trafficking rehabilitation center for men, women, and children with official victim status. The government assisted 220 victims at this facility in 2019, compared with 195 victims in 2018. This center provided shelter, medical, psychological, legal, and job placement assistance. The center had the capacity to accommodate foreign victims, but the government has not served any foreign victims in the shelter since its opening. The government operated 197 centers to assist vulnerable women, including trafficking victims; these centers were managed and funded by regional governments, some of which coordinated with local anti-trafficking organizations. NGOs continued to report cooperation with the government for victim assistance but reported difficulties working with authorities to open legal cases on behalf of the victim; in 2019, the government continued to provide in-kind support to local NGOs for the provision of victim assistance, such as food and clothing. While the government did not provide tax benefits for NGOs, it did provide one NGO free use of a government-owned building. Some NGOs competed for and received grant funding from a general governmental assistance fund; the government reported distributing 817 million soum ($86,000) to these NGOs. NGOs noted...
MOI officials increasingly complied with legal requirements to maintain victim confidentiality; however, victims’ identities were not kept confidential during court proceedings. Victims could bring civil suits against traffickers, but the government did not provide legal representation for victims, and most victims could not afford legal representation on their own; the government reported no cases were filed in 2019.

PREVENTION

The government increased prevention efforts. In July 2019, the president of Uzbekistan created the National Commission on Trafficking in Persons and Forced Labor (the Commission) and appointed the chair of the Senate as the national rapporteur. The Commission was composed of two high-level sub-committees: one on trafficking in persons, chaired by the Minister of Internal Affairs, and one on forced labor, chaired by the Minister of Employment and Labor Relations. The Commission initiated the creation of regional commissions chaired by the governors of the country’s 12 regions, one autonomous republic, and one independent city (Tashkent). The Commission convened monthly, and the regional commissions met every 14 days. Members of the anti-trafficking community from Uzbekistan’s civil society participated in the national and regional meetings. The government adopted a national action plan, a roadmap developed by an NGO, and a series of recommendations submitted to the government by an international organization.

The government continued to take significant steps to reduce the mobilization of its citizens for the forced picking of cotton, including by increasing wages to cotton pickers by 15 percent above 2018 rates for the first pass, maintaining its commitment to not mobilize students, improving working conditions for pickers, and fulfilling its new commitment to not mobilize teachers and medical workers. The 2019 harvest marked the sixth consecutive year the government conducted a nationwide campaign to raise public awareness of its prohibition of child labor in the cotton harvest. The government continued to uphold its ban against the use of child labor in the annual cotton harvest; while there were isolated reports of children working in the fields, there continued to be no reports of systemic mobilization. The government, in coordination with the ILO, continued to conduct awareness-raising campaigns to ensure all citizens were aware of their labor rights. During the 2019 harvest, the central government continued to set cotton production quotas and demand farmers and local officials fulfill these state-assigned quotas, which subsequently led to the mobilization of adult forced labor in some places. Farmers who were unable to fulfill their quotas risked losing the rights to farm their government-leased land. In March 2020, the government announced it would permanently eliminate the cotton quota system for the 2020 fall harvest and onwards.

In previous reporting periods, the government coerced government-employed teachers and medical workers to perform field work without pay and under threat of penalty, including dismissal from their jobs. During the 2019 fall harvest, however, the central government emphasized through wide-reaching awareness campaigns the ban on mobilization of teachers and medical workers. The ILO reported the government effectively implemented the prohibition on forcing students, teachers, nurses, and doctors; independent third-party monitors did not observe these groups picking cotton. Observers continued to credit the increased remuneration for attracting more voluntary cotton pickers and the large number of otherwise unemployed pickers. The government reported it also exempted pickers’ wages from income tax (12 percent) and compulsory savings (seven percent). After the first picking round of the harvest, voluntary laborers decreased, as cotton became less plentiful and the weather worsened. Reports of forced labor increased, particularly in the regions of Syrdarya, Surkhandarya, Khorezm, and Tashkent. To fill the voluntary labor void, local government officials in some regions mobilized other public employees, among others, those at factories, grain mills, utility companies, banks, law enforcement agencies, firefighters, and soldiers, as well as prisoners. The ILO and civil society reported instances of local government officials in some areas requiring public sector employees to pick cotton, or pay for a replacement worker through an unregulated, informal system, creating a penalty for not participating in the forced labor system and a lucrative means of extortion for corrupt officials. In some cases, local governments pressured private businesses to provide pickers or pay fees to support the harvest, although it was not always clear if the fees funded payment of local administrative costs, or were a means of extortion. NGOs reported many of the voluntary pickers preferred to be hired as replacement pickers by those seeking to avoid the cotton fields, which enabled them to earn income beyond the picking wages.

For the fifth consecutive year, the government allowed the ILO to monitor the cotton harvest for child and forced labor, and ILO monitors had unimpeded access to the cotton fields for observations and to interview laborers. The ILO assessed the government forced approximately 102,000 pickers out of an estimated 1.75 million member workforce to work in the 2019 harvest; a decrease compared with 170,000 in 2018 and 336,000 in 2017. However, the ILO noted that in 2019 the annual rate in the reduction of forced laborers has slowed compared with previous years. Some experts continued to criticize the ILO’s methodology and assessed that the ILO findings underestimated the level of forced labor in the harvest; however, the experts agreed the government was making concerted efforts to reduce forced labor. For the second year, the government granted the ILO access to data acquired through the government’s Cotton Harvest Feedback Mechanism, which included telephone hotlines and messaging applications dedicated to receiving reports of labor violations; the mechanism received 1,563 complaints related to forced labor during the cotton harvest season, and the government allowed the ILO to observe how it addressed such complaints. The government doubled the number of labor investigators assigned to look into these complaints across the country to 400. The government reported these complaints resulted in fines to 259 officials totaling 550 million soum ($57,890), compared with 202 fines in 2018. The government did not share additional details on the total number of forced labor victims, including children, identified through the mechanism. Observers continued to report concerns about the effectiveness of the feedback mechanism, stating some pickers were concerned about reprisal or the effectiveness of investigations. For the second year, the government included independent human rights activists in plans to monitor the harvest, conduct field interviews, participate in awareness-raising activities, and review cases gathered through the mechanism. Observers reported isolated incidents in which local government officials harassed and temporarily detained independent civil society who attempted to monitor the cotton harvest. Media, including state media outlets, continued to report on forced labor practices, problems, and violations without penalization or censorship.

The government continued to implement ILO recommendations, further reduced land allocated for cotton cultivation, and purchased more machinery to work toward the mechanization of the harvest. In 2019, the government reported opening an additional 61 private textile-cotton clusters (13 in 2018), which accounted for 63 percent of cotton production land. The clusters processed cotton from cultivation to finished textile products and paid higher wages to workers. While the ILO reported a reduced risk of forced labor within clusters, the central government still set quotas for these private clusters during the reporting period, and independent observers continued to identify instances of forced labor on cluster farmlands.

In the previous reporting period, the government reported encouraging ministers to use a special fund under the Ministry of Employment and Labor Relations to recruit unemployed individuals for public works, instead of compelling civil servants and students to perform public works. The government did not report how much money it allocated to the fund in 2019, compared with allocating 714 billion soum ($75.16 million) to this fund in 2018. The Ministry of Employment and Labor Relations did not note it had collected 6.6 billion soum ($694,740) in fines for labor violations which were contributed to the fund. In 2019, the government ratified four ILO conventions; Convention 144 on tripartite consultation (international labor standards), Protocol P029 of 2014 to the forced labor convention, Convention 129 on labor inspection in agriculture, and Convention 81 on labor protection in private homes, despite the hazardous nature of home silk production. The government continued to call for hashar, or volunteer workdays, throughout the country; some local leaders characterized cotton picking and street cleaning as hashar.

The government provided support to labor migrants abroad, including victims of forced labor, and allocated a budget of 200 billion soum ($21.05 million) for assistance to labor migrants. The Uzbekistan Agency for Foreign Labor Migration continued outreach to prospective labor migrants, serving to reduce potential risks of trafficking among this population. The Agency conducted pre-departure consultations on labor and migration laws in the country of destination, which issued health insurance, cell phone SIM cards, and provided detailed information about how to legally enter, remain, and work in Russia. The government also operated a 24-hour hotline in Russia that provided Uzbek labor migrants with legal advice and advised them of their rights, and directed them to the nearest consulate for assistance. The government maintained employment agreements to protect citizens’ labor rights with Japan, Poland, Russia, South Korea, and Turkey. Private companies, including foreign and local, had official permission from the government to recruit Uzbek citizens for jobs abroad and within Uzbekistan. Although the companies were required to obtain licenses, the government did not report the number of licenses granted nor any monitoring of recruitment fees charged to job applicants.

The expanded labor inspectorate conducted 21,172 inspections and investigated 18,332 complaints in 2019; the inspectorate did not provide additional information on forced labor cases, or report screening for trafficking indicators or referring any cases for criminal investigation. The labor inspectorate was not empowered to bring criminal charges for first time violations of the law against forced labor. Authorities continued to hold wide-scale public awareness efforts on transnational sex and labor trafficking, including through events, print media, television, and radio, often through partnering with and providing in-kind support to NGOs. The government maintained a 24-hour hotline; in 2019, the line received 422 trafficking-related phone calls, of which 75 were identified as trafficking victims. An NGO maintained a foreign donor-funded hotline. The government did not conduct efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic victims in Uzbekistan, and traffickers exploit victims from Uzbekistan abroad. During 2019, the government continued to demand farmers and local officials fulfill state-assigned cotton production quotas or face penalties, which caused local officials to compel work in the annual cotton harvest. The ILO and observers noted the systemic mobilization of child labor was eliminated in the 2017 harvest, although isolated reports of the use of child labor continue. During the 2019 cotton harvest, the ILO reported a decrease in the use of government-compelled forced labor, citing no evidence of systemic mobilizations of students, teachers, nurses, and doctors. However, local officials forced other groups of public employees to work in the cotton harvest when there was a lack of voluntary workers. International reports indicate some adults who refused to pick cotton, did not pay for a replacement worker, or did not fulfill their daily quota could face the loss of social benefits, termination of employment, or other forms of harassment. Some employees and market vendors could choose to hire a replacement picker directly, pay a fee for the mobilizer to find a replacement picker, or pay a fine rather than pick cotton, a coercive, though illegal, system that penalized those who chose not to participate in the harvest and created a lucrative means of extortion for corrupt managers and officials. Private companies in some regions mobilized employees for the harvest under the threat of increased government inspections of, and taxes on, their operations.

Government-compelled forced labor of adults remained in other sectors as well. In years past, there were isolated reports stating that local officials forced farmers to cultivate silk cocoons, and uncorroborated reports that they removed children from school to harvest the cocoons. Despite an April 2018 government prohibition, there continued to be instances of local officials forcing teachers, students (including children), private businesses employees, and others to work in construction and other forms of non-cotton agriculture and to clean parks, streets, and buildings. Officials occasionally compelled labor by labeling these tasks as hashar, voluntary work for the community’s benefit.

Traffickers exploit Uzbek women and children in sex trafficking in the Middle East, Eurasia, and Asia, and internally in brothels, clubs, and private residences. Children in institutions were vulnerable to sex trafficking. Traffickers subject Uzbek men, and to a lesser extent women, to forced labor in Kazakhstan, Russia, Moldova, Turkey, and in other Asian, Middle Eastern, and European countries in the construction, oil and gas, agricultural, retail, and food sectors. An NGO noted that Uzbek citizens who had traveled with official employment contracts to Russia failed to properly register the migrants with the authorities, forced them to live in barracks, and underpaid or did not pay them at all.

VANUATU: TIER 2

The Government of Vanuatu does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government continued prosecution of the country’s first trafficking case and provided some victim support services. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. The government did not initiate any additional trafficking investigations during the reporting period, nor did it conduct public awareness campaigns or administer systematic anti-trafficking training for its law enforcement officials. Contrary to a victim-centered protection approach, in the aforementioned ongoing case, the government forced some victims to stay in the country for the duration of the prosecution without allowing them to earn an income, possibly increasing their indebtedness and vulnerability to re-trafficking upon repatriation.
international organization provided trafficking-related training to officials' ability to adequately investigate trafficking cases. An trafficking investigations; however, insufficiencies in the country's Unit (NIU) within the Vanuatu Police Force was the leading agency on convictions during the reporting period. The National Intelligence not report any new trafficking investigations, prosecutions, or traffickers remained in detention for the duration of the trial; the "threatening" under the Penal Code Act (Cap 135), in addition to charged the suspects with slavery, money laundering, and the country's history—against the four suspects. The government initiated court proceedings—the first trafficking prosecution in Bangladeshi victims. The following November, the government in March 2019, Vanuatuan authorities arrested four Bangladeshi commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, allowing fines in lieu of imprisonment, these penalties were not sufficiently stringent; however, with respect to sex trafficking, by of up to 75 million VT ($664,890), or both. These penalties were and prescribed penalties of up to 15 years' imprisonment, a fine up to 50 million Vanuatu Vatu (VT) ($443,260), or both. Article 35 criminalized trafficking in persons offenses involving adult victims up to 50 million Vanuatu Vatu (VT) ($443,260), or both. Article 35 criminalized trafficking in persons offenses involving child victims and prescribed penalties of up to 15 years' imprisonment, a fine of up to 75 million VT ($664,890), or both. These penalties were sufficiently stringent; however, with respect to sex trafficking, by allowing fines in lieu of imprisonment, these penalties were not commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape.

In March 2019, Vanuatuan authorities arrested four Bangladeshi nationals for their role in a forced labor case involving 101 Bangladeshi victims. The following November, the government initiated court proceedings—the first trafficking prosecution in the country's history—against the four suspects. The government charged the suspects with slavery, money laundering, and "threatening" under the Penal Code Act (Cap 135), in addition to trafficking-related charges under the CTTOC. The four alleged traffickers remained in detention for the duration of the trial; the case was ongoing at the end of the reporting period.

Other than the aforementioned prosecution, the government did not report any new trafficking investigations, prosecutions, or convictions during the reporting period. The National Intelligence Unit (NIU) within the Vanuatu Police Force was the leading agency on trafficking investigations; however, insufficiencies in the country's anti-trafficking policy infrastructure reportedly constrained NIU officials' ability to adequately investigate trafficking cases. An international organization provided trafficking-related training to immigration officials and a standard operating manual for victim identification; however, there was no standard anti-trafficking training for government and law enforcement officials, and the government did not maintain or implement comprehensive SOPs. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government employees complicit in human trafficking offenses.

PROTECTION

The government undertook efforts to protect victims. In 2018, with assistance from an international organization, the government identified 101 Bangladeshi adult male victims in forced labor in the construction industry and in domestic service. Immigration officials, in partnership with an international organization, developed SOPs for border control mechanisms, including a section on trafficking victim identification; however, the government lacked comprehensive, government-wide victim identification and referral SOPs. The government, with support from an international organization, provided housing, health services, and food for the victims. Formal shelters were not available to male victims; the government provided, on an ad hoc basis, the 101 victims with three furnished properties. Officials reportedly diverted funds from other government entities to provide services for the victims, specifically from the fuel budget for immigration officials’ vehicles. Protection services were intended to be time-limited, and authorities conditioned some services on the victims’ participation in court proceedings against the alleged traffickers. The government required some of the victims to remain in Vanuatu to serve as witnesses in the ongoing prosecution and stated it would not repatriate them until it had secured a court ruling. The government did not have a process in place to change victims’ immigration status in order to grant them permission to work while awaiting the conclusion of the court process, intensifying some victims’ indebtedness. Authorities reportedly did not share information or coordinate with their Bangladeshi counterparts on repatriation options, despite repeated requests for information from the Government of Bangladesh.

The government provided victims who participated in the court proceedings with longer-term shelter options, immigration support, legal support, and witness protection services and advocacy; those who did not participate in the trial received only short-term housing. Thirteen of the 101 victims testified against the alleged traffickers and the courts took steps to protect their identities during the proceedings. The government provided interpretation throughout the court proceedings for the victims. An international organization reported the government’s requirement that victims remain in country and serve as witnesses may have re-traumatized several victims. An international organization funded and facilitated flights back to Bangladesh for the majority of the victims who did not testify in the trial. The government did not provide legal alternatives to removal of trafficking victims to countries in which victims would face retribution or hardship.

PREVENTION

The government undertook efforts to prevent trafficking. The Transnational Crime Unit had a national action plan, which included anti-trafficking equities; however, the plan did not address all forms of trafficking, and limited resources hindered the implementation of the plan. In 2019, the government created a national security strategy containing trafficking-related action plan items, including developing a framework to aid individuals displaced by natural disasters, creating support systems for victims of crime, and enhancing the monitoring of Vanuatu’s territorial waters; implementation was ongoing at the end of the reporting period. The government did not conduct any anti-trafficking awareness campaigns during the reporting period. The government did not have a trafficking hotline and lacked an adequate research system to assess the scope of its trafficking problem or evaluate

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

- Amend anti-trafficking legislation to remove sentencing provisions that allow for the payment of fines in lieu of imprisonment for sex trafficking offenses. • Increase efforts to prosecute and convict traffickers under anti-trafficking laws and sentence convicted traffickers to adequate penalties, which should involve significant prison terms. • Allocate increased resources for and implement victim protection benefits, including permission to work for foreign victims who wish to participate in prosecutions against their alleged traffickers and a formalized process to consider requests to remain in the country permanently, taking into consideration humanitarian and compassionate factors. • Cease compelling foreign victims to remain in Vanuatu for the length of prosecutions against their alleged traffickers. • Develop and implement standard operating procedures (SOPs) for victim identification, referral, and protection. • Provide training on victim identification and anti-trafficking legislation for all relevant officials. • Institute a campaign to raise public awareness of trafficking, including among remote communities. • Improve anti-trafficking coordination with international partners, including by increasing information sharing with sending countries and instituting standard repatriation procedures. • Accede to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol.

VANUATU TIER RANKING BY YEAR

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Tier</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td>2WL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2014</td>
<td>2WL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2015</td>
<td>2WL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2016</td>
<td>2WL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2017</td>
<td>2WL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2018</td>
<td>2WL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2019</td>
<td>2WL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2020</td>
<td>2WL</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
its anti-trafficking efforts. The labor department licensed and monitored agencies that could recruit workers from Vanuatu for overseas work. The government prohibited the imposition of recruitment fees for seasonal employment work outside of Vanuatu and issued a notice of “non-compliance” to agents who charged migrant workers recruitment fees. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. The government provided its diplomats with training that included anti-trafficking content. The government, in partnership with an international organization, established a system to digitize and streamline citizen access to voter cards, citizenship documents, and national identification cards. Vanuatu is not a party to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
Human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Vanuatu, and traffickers exploit victims from Vanuatu abroad. Local traffickers exploit individuals from China, Thailand, Bangladesh, and the Philippines in Vanuatu. Traffickers target migrant women in the hospitality and tourism sectors and low skilled foreign workers in high-risk sectors, such as agriculture, mining, fishing, logging, construction, and domestic service. Chinese and South Asian migrant women are particularly at risk for labor trafficking in bars, beauty salons, and massage parlors. Bangladeshi criminal groups have reportedly lured Bangladeshi individuals with false promises of high-paying job opportunities in Australia, transported them through Fiji, India, and Singapore, and then subjected them to forced labor in the construction industry in Vanuatu. Some of the victims take out loans averaging $30,000 to pay relevant travel expenses, which the traffickers exploit through debt-based coercion. Foreign fishermen working on board Vanuatu-flagged, Taiwan-owned vessels have experienced indicators of forced labor, including deceptive recruitment practices, abuse of vulnerability, excessive overtime, withholding of wages, physical and sexual violence, and abusive living and working conditions on board.

Natural disasters and climate-induced displacement significantly increases Vanuatuan’s vulnerability to trafficking, particularly as a majority of the population relies on small-scale and subsistence agriculture. As many as 11,000 Vanuatuan evacuated from active volcanic areas in 2018 are at higher risk of trafficking due to the economic hardships ensuing from their ongoing displacement. Women and girls may also be at risk of debt-based coercion in sex trafficking and domestic servitude via the customary practice of bride-price payments. The incidence of bride-price payments is linked to broader economic hardship and vulnerability, particularly in the context of the country’s frequent natural disasters. Children are also subjected to trafficking through child swapping—brokered as an inter-familial cultural practice or to pay off debts. There were reports of children exploited in commercial sex facilitated by taxi drivers. Forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation of children occur on fishing vessels in Vanuatu. Foreign tourists aboard boats reportedly approach remote Vanuatu communities and offer money in exchange for marriage with underage girls as a ploy for short-term sexual exploitation. Locals onshore, acting as recruiters, also reportedly take underage girls aboard vessels and subject them to commercial sexual exploitation by foreign workers, often for weeks at a time. The local recruiters, and in some instances the families, receive payment for recruiting and transporting the girls to the boats. Children may also experience conditions indicative of forced labor in the illegal logging industry and in newspaper sales.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Investigate, prosecute, and convict trafficking cases, including complicit officials and anyone involved in the forcible recruitment of children into illegal armed groups. • Provide specialized services for all trafficking victims, including repatriated victims, children, soldiers, men, boys, and LGBTI individuals. • Draft and enact comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation criminalizing all forms of trafficking, including the criminalization of child sex trafficking without elements of force, fraud, or coercion, and the trafficking of men and boys. • Increase staffing and funding for the office of the special prosecutor to combat trafficking. • Educate Venezuelans fleeing the country on the risks of human trafficking, as well as where and how to seek services. • Train all migration and law enforcement officials operating in border crossings on trafficking indicators. • Given significant concerns about forced labor indicators in Cuban Medical Missions, screen Cuban medical professionals for trafficking indicators and refer those identified to appropriate services. • Work in partnership with civil society organizations and other service providers to assist victims. • Implement formal procedures and training for identifying victims among vulnerable populations, such as individuals in commercial sex, and for referring victims for care. • Develop and publish an anti-trafficking action plan taking into account present challenges and allocate resources for its implementation. • Enhance interagency cooperation by forming a permanent anti-trafficking working group. • Improve data collection on government anti-trafficking efforts and make this data publicly available.

PROSECUTION
Venezuelan authorities under Maduro maintained very weak law enforcement efforts. Venezuelan law did not criminalize all forms of trafficking. Venezuelan law criminalized labor trafficking and some forms of sex trafficking of women and girls through a 2007 law on women’s rights that prescribed penalties of 15 to 20 years’ imprisonment. Inconsistent with international law, the law required a demonstration of force, fraud, or coercion to constitute child sex trafficking and therefore, did not criminalize all forms of trafficking. Venezuelan law failed to criminalize trafficking of men and boys when perpetrators were not part of an organized criminal... organization. The law addressing organized crime criminalized trafficking by organized criminal groups of three or more individuals with penalties of 20 to 30 years’ imprisonment. The penalties for these trafficking crimes were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape.

The organized crime office (ONCDOFT), with a staff of approximately 60 employees, continued to be the lead investigative entity for trafficking crimes; however, most officers did not investigate trafficking or trafficking-related offenses. Venezuelan authorities did not report any training or operations in 2019, despite an increase in reports of trafficking of Venezuelans in border regions. Authorities did not report investigating, prosecuting, or convicting anyone for trafficking; however, press reports indicated 17 individuals were either arrested or indicted for trafficking crimes in 2019, compared with 99 in 2018. In a notable case, authorities under Maduro arrested and indicted nine individuals, including three complicit officials, with trafficking crimes after a ship en route to Trinidad and Tobago, alleged to have been transporting 90 fleeing Venezuelan migrants, was found wrecked at sea. According to stakeholders, traffickers sometimes abandon ships at sea and exploit women and girls in sex trafficking in nearby Caribbean islands. In November, the Maduro regime’s attorney general created a special prosecutor’s office to investigate trafficking crimes against women, develop anti-trafficking policies, and facilitate victims’ access to justice. Stakeholders commended the decision but indicated the office remained understaffed with one prosecutor for the entire country, and its mandate did not include trafficking crimes against transgender individuals, children, or men. As a result, they are left unprotected and at risk of re-victimization.

Authorities did not report investigating complicity in trafficking crimes; however, some observers reported Venezuelan authorities facilitated and sometimes actively participated in trafficking crimes near border areas. According to stakeholders, officials at high levels linked to Maduro were complicit in trafficking crimes perpetrated by illegal armed groups, which operate in Venezuelan territory with impunity. An investigation conducted by the democratically elected National Assembly indicated coast guard officials, armed forces, and security services were acquiescent in transnational trafficking crimes, allowing the departure of vessels transporting trafficking victims to Caribbean islands.

PROTECTION
Venezuelan authorities did not report making efforts to identify or protect victims. According to media sources, the ONCDOFT continued to operate a 24-hour hotline to receive general reports of abuse against women, including trafficking allegations; however, several of the numbers provided were often inactive. Venezuelan authorities did not report identifying trafficking victims among vulnerable populations or referring victims to services. In 2019, one civil society organization estimated authorities under Maduro had identified approximately 273 victims exploited by trafficking rings between January and June.

In previous reporting years, victim referrals to different Venezuelan authorities, including ONCDOFT and the women’s ministry, occurred on an ad hoc basis. The availability of victim services remained limited, and there were no specialized shelter for trafficking victims in the country. Civil society and religious organizations provided some assistance to victims of trafficking, including services for child victims of forced labor in Táchira state; outpatient psychological assistance for adult and child victims of sexual exploitation, including trafficking; and shelter for women victims of sexual exploitation, including trafficking. Historically, victims could reportedly access government centers for victims of domestic violence or at-risk youth, although services for male victims were minimal. Venezuelan law and authorities under Maduro did not conceptualize males as potential victims of trafficking; therefore, it was likely services for male victims of trafficking, particularly for men, did not exist. Authorities under Maduro reportedly made psychological and medical examinations available to trafficking victims, but additional victim services, such as follow-up medical aid, legal assistance with filing a complaint, job training, and reintegration assistance, were extremely limited. International media sources continued to report on the growing number of Venezuelan victims identified abroad, many repatriated or deported back to Venezuela; authorities under Maduro did not report what assistance, if any, they provided victims upon the victims’ return or if authorities coordinated with foreign governments to ensure the protection of those victims.

PREVENTION
Venezuelan authorities under Maduro maintained inadequate prevention efforts. No permanent anti-trafficking interagency body existed, and although, authorities allegedly had a national action plan since 2006, it was unclear if it was used or updated to include present challenges, such as the increase in cases of forced labor in domestic service, a greater number of victims repatriated from other countries, and efforts necessary to mitigate the exploitation of those leaving the country as a result of the economic crisis. ONCDOFT organized a film screening with the participation of volunteer police officers to raise awareness of trafficking crimes, and the Ministry of Women in Miranda State convened a forum to discuss trafficking issues. In both cases, it was unclear who attended or what the audience was. Venezuelan authorities did not provide anti-trafficking training for its diplomatic personnel and did not report any specific activities to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Venezuela, and traffickers exploit Venezuelan victims abroad. As the economic situation continued to spiral into critical deterioration, more than 5 million Venezuelans have fled Venezuela to neighboring countries. The UN estimates approximately 6.5 million Venezuelans will have fled the country by the end of 2020. Traffickers have exploited Venezuelan victims in Aruba, The Bahamas, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Curacao, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guyana, Macau, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Spain, Suriname, and Trinidad and Tobago. Venezuelan women and girls were particularly vulnerable to sex trafficking in Colombia and Ecuador. An uncorroborated press report alleged the Spanish Ministry of Interior reported that by mid-2019, 391 Venezuelan victims of trafficking had been identified in Spain. While Spanish authorities did not confirm the exact number of Venezuelan victims identified, they reported in 2019, Venezuela was the number one source country for victims exploited in Spain. NGOs noted sex trafficking and forced labor in domestic service within the country increased in 2019. Traffickers increasingly exploit Venezuelan men in forced labor in other countries, including islands of the Dutch Caribbean. Dissident Colombian illegal armed groups, especially near border regions, subjected Venezuelans to forced criminality and forced recruitment. In 2019, the UN, foreign governments, media outlets, and credible NGOs reported Venezuelan government officials, including members of security forces and local authorities, mostly those near border regions, colluded with, tolerated, and allowed Colombian illegal armed groups to operate in Venezuelan territory with impunity. Venezuelan officials acting at the behest of former president Nicolas Maduro and his inner circle or in their own personal interests, including out of fear for their safety, reportedly provided support and safe haven described below to FARC dissidents and the ELN. These groups grew through the recruitment of child soldiers and exploitation of Victims of trafficking.

VIETNAM: TIER 2 WATCH LIST

The Government of Vietnam does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. These efforts included providing trafficking victims the affirmative right to legal representation in judicial proceedings; increasing the amount of time victims could remain in a shelter by one month and the amount of financial support provided to them for certain basic needs; continuing to operate large-scale awareness campaigns in communities vulnerable to trafficking, including workers migrating overseas; and training law enforcement officials. However, the government did not demonstrate overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period. For the third consecutive year, the government identified significantly fewer victims than the previous year. Victim identification and assistance procedures remained cumbersome, slow, and ineffective. A lack of interagency coordination and unfamiliarity among some provincial officials with anti-trafficking law and victim protection roles and responsibilities continued to impede anti-trafficking efforts. Labor recruitment firms—most affiliated with state-owned enterprises—and unlicensed brokers reportedly charged workers seeking overseas employment higher fees than the law allows; those workers incurred high debts and were at heightened risk for forced labor, including through debt-based coercion. Despite reports of official complicity, the government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of officials complicit in trafficking offenses. Therefore Vietnam remained on the Tier 2 Watch List for the second consecutive year.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

Adopt a 2021-2025 national action plan that clarifies the roles of national and subnational entities across ministries; stipulates law enforcement, protection, and prevention actions; is informed by disaggregated trafficking data collection; and allocates sufficient resources to implementation. • Vigorously prosecute all forms of trafficking and convict and punish traffickers, including in cases involving forced labor or complicit officials. • Amend the penal code to criminalize all forms of sex trafficking of 16- and 17-year-old children, consistent with international law. • Continue to train officials on implementing guidelines for Articles 150 and 151 of the penal code, with a focus on identifying and investigating forced labor and internal trafficking cases, including those involving male victims. • In coordination with civil society, update implementing guidelines on victim identification to reduce bureaucratic obstacles preventing victim detection and train cross-sectoral officials on their usage. • Invite independent verification of the termination of forced labor within drug treatment centers and provide results of such verification. • Coordinate and effectively implement policies across government agencies to identify and assist victims among vulnerable groups, such as migrant workers, individuals in commercial sex, child laborers, and North Koreans and train relevant officials on these procedures. • Take steps to eliminate all worker-paid recruitment fees and predatory recruitment practices for workers migrating abroad or to Vietnam, including by strengthening efforts to monitor labor recruitment companies and third-party sub-brokers and prosecuting predatory or illegal sub-brokerage networks. • Expand training for social workers, first responders, and the judiciary on victim-centered approaches to working with victims of trafficking, including trauma-informed care. • Increase national funding available to provincial-level authorities to provide services to reintegrated victims of trafficking.
PROSECUTION
The government decreased law enforcement efforts but improved its anti-trafficking training. Article 150 of the penal code criminalized labor trafficking and sex trafficking of adults and prescribed penalties of five to 10 years’ imprisonment and fines of 20 million to 100 million Vietnamese dong (VND) ($860 to $4,320). Article 151 criminalized labor trafficking and sex trafficking of children under the age of 16 and prescribed penalties of seven to 12 years’ imprisonment and fines of 50 million to 200 million VND ($2,160 to $8,630). These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with regard to sex trafficking, commensurate with other serious crimes, such as rape, inconsistent with international law. Article 150 required that children under the ages of 16 and 17 years of age had required a demonstration of force, fraud, or coercion to constitute a sex trafficking offense; therefore, it did not criminalize all forms of child sex trafficking. Civil society previously reported this led to confusion on how to treat cases involving 16- and 17-year-old children, especially for cases involving labor trafficking, resulting in victims being treated as adults. The government sought not to address this issue administratively, but illustrative examples in specific cases were not known by the close of the reporting period.

For the third consecutive year, the government reported a decline in investigations, prosecutions, and convictions of trafficking cases during the reporting period. Because the government did not disaggregate its data by trafficking type, it did not report—for the eighth consecutive year—whether it prosecuted any suspected traffickers under labor trafficking provisions of the anti-trafficking law. According to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA), the Ministry of Public Security (MPS) and Vietnam Border Guards (under the Ministry of Defense) identified 175 trafficking cases, a decrease from 211 in 2018 and 350 in 2017, involving 229 alleged traffickers, compared with 276 in 2018 and more than 500 in 2017. The procuracies (Prosecutor’s Office) reported initiating the prosecution of 166 defendants for trafficking offenses, a decrease from 194 in 2018 and 245 in 2017, and the court system secured 174 convictions, a decrease from 213 in 2018 and 244 in 2017. Sentences ranged from less than three years’ to 30 years’ imprisonment. Disparate government bodies continued to report discrepant, overlapping, or incomplete data on anti-trafficking law enforcement and victim identification. Authorities did not provide comprehensive data on trafficking offenses disaggregated by type of trafficking, victim age or gender, source, or destination, making it difficult to distinguish anti-trafficking efforts from those for other crimes, including migrant smuggling cases. During the reporting period, the government’s existing bilateral anti-trafficking agreements with Cambodia, China, Laos, Republic of Korea, Thailand, and the United Kingdom (UK) to improve law enforcement coordination remained in force. The agreements helped to facilitate law enforcement actions by subnational officials in this centrally managed country. Under the UK agreement, in April and August 2019 the government issued an action plan that assigned specific anti-trafficking responsibilities to various agencies and approved a UK-sponsored project to combat human trafficking. Following the October 2019 discovery of 39 deceased Vietnamese nationals, including three minors, in a refrigerated container truck in England, the Vietnamese government issued a resolution ordering relevant agencies and diplomatic personnel in the UK to strictly investigate the incident and curb migrant smuggling.

Despite some reports of official complicity, the government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government employees complicit in human trafficking offenses; however, corruption and official complicity, especially with respect to labor export enterprises, remained significant concerns, inhibiting law enforcement action during the year. The lack of an extradition treaty with China impeded prosecutions of traffickers, and officials and NGOs cited China’s poor cooperation despite other formal bilateral agreements. The government did not report extradition data.

A lack of coordination across agencies at provincial levels, persistent budgetary constraints, poor understanding of the relevant legislation among local officials, and confusion about individual provinces’ roles and responsibilities in the context of the national action plan continued to hamper effective law enforcement efforts. The government did not report how the 2018 restructuring of the MPS, in which the MPS Staff Department responsible for anti-trafficking policies and procedures merged with the Criminal Police Department responsible for trafficking operations, improved the flow of information and interagency coordination or law enforcement efforts during the reporting period. Police and other officials from at least one province collaborated with an NGO to identify Vietnamese victims in China and launch trafficking investigations, although temporary border closures in January 2020 significantly hampered those efforts. The government reported training, at times in coordination with international organizations, 153 law enforcement officials on Articles 150 and 151; 136 border guards and Women’s Union officials; 128 interagency officials on combating child trafficking; 410 interagency officials on Vietnamese anti-trafficking regulations; and nearly 300 diplomatic and consular officers. Additionally, the Women’s Union and officials from many provinces, districts, and communes organized multiple trainings, including on prevention and victim assistance.

PROTECTION
The government maintained efforts to protect victims but identified and provided services to fewer of them. In 2019, authorities reported identifying, at times in cooperation with NGOs, 300 victims of trafficking—a decrease from 490 in 2018 and 670 in 2017; however, for some victims the form of exploitation was unclear. The government did not provide comprehensive statistics disaggregating cases by type of trafficking, victim age or gender, source, or destination. The government had common victim identification criteria as part of the Coordinated Mekong Ministerial Initiative against Human Trafficking and its own 2014 procedure for victim identification; however, neither the criteria nor the procedures were reported to be proactively or widely employed, including among women arrested for commercial sex acts, migrant workers returning from abroad, and child laborers. Foreign victims, including children, remained at high risk of deportation without screening or referral to protective services. The victim identification process remained overly cumbersome and complex, requiring sign-off from multiple ministries before victims could be formally identified and assisted. Some local officials and NGOs reported the central government had not provided sufficient resources or implementing guidelines on the new penal code or revised guidelines on identifying victims, all of which prevented border guards, law enforcement, and other officials from fully detecting and assisting victims.

The government reported 269 of the 300 victims requested and received assistance, compared with 490 in 2018 and 500 in 2017. The victims received assistance in essential needs, medical support, mental health consultation, legal support, education, and vocational training. The government referred 110 victims to shelters. The government did not systematically refer victims to protective services due to inadequacies in its formal referral process, including some border guards’ unfamiliarity with trafficking crimes, a lack of inter-jurisdictional cooperation, and incomplete data collection processes. The government’s 2019 budget for victim assistance was 7.12 billion VND ($307,280), excluding amounts provided by international organizations, NGOs, and donors. The government did not report how it allocated these funds. Observers previously reported national authorities did not devote adequate funds for victim protection, encouraging provincial governments to use their own funds for trafficking programs to decentralize further this responsibility, and relied heavily on civil society to provide protection services with limited in-kind support. In December 2019, the government affirmatively provided victims the right to legal representation, and in January 2020, it significantly enhanced victim assistance by extending from two to three months the authorized length of a victim’s stay at support facilities and increasing the amount of financial support for certain basic needs. The government continued to operate 94 social protection or social service centers, some funded by NGOs, to assist victims nationwide, but none provided services to male or child victims exclusively. The government did not report if it addressed previous reports of local and provincial government officials employing practices that could be re-traumatizing to victims, including limiting shelter residents’ freedom of movement.

In November 2019, the Supreme People’s Court issued additional guidance on trial procedures for cases involving sexual assault victims under the age of 18, including trafficking victims. The new protective measures included assigning experienced judges to cases and limiting the use of victims’ live testimonies, among other measures. In December 2019, guidance implementing the 2015 Criminal Procedure Code took effect and newly guaranteed victims of trafficking the right to legal representation. The law provided compensation for victims, and the government reported victims received compensation in 16 of 20 of the publicly reported trafficking cases during the year.

The government maintained labor representatives at diplomatic missions in countries that host large numbers of documented Vietnamese migrant workers such as Japan, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia, South Korea, Taiwan, and the United Arab Emirates (UAE). These missions could provide basic provisions, transportation, and health care to Vietnamese citizens subjected to trafficking abroad. The government reported repatriating 51 victims to Vietnam and assisting an additional 331 victims overseas, compared with 386 Vietnamese victims in 2018 and 138 in 2017. Some diplomatic personnel previously reportedly lacked sufficient training to adequately assist victims, and NGOs abroad previously reported some overseas missions were unresponsive to foreign government and NGO attempts to refer Vietnamese victims to them. The government encouraged trafficking victims to assist in judicial proceedings against traffickers and offered victims some protection and compensation. The law protected victims from prosecution for unlawful acts traffickers coerced them to commit, but NGOs previously reported victims were less likely to come forward about their abuses in a judicial setting due to fears they may face arrest or deportation for crossing the border without documentation. Civil society previously reported Vietnamese victims who migrated via irregular means, were involved in criminal activity as a result of their trafficking, or had criticized the Vietnamese government, feared reprisals from authorities. These victims were less likely to seek support and were vulnerable to re-trafficking. International observers previously reported government officials often blamed Vietnamese citizens for their exploitative conditions abroad or suggested victims inflate abuses to avoid immigration violations. The government did not report offering foreign victims legal alternatives to their removal to countries where they may face retribution or hardship.

PREVENTION

The government increased efforts to prevent trafficking. A steering committee chaired by a deputy prime minister, with the minister and a vice minister of public security as deputy chairs, continued to direct Vietnam’s anti-trafficking efforts. During the reporting period, the government continued to implement the third phase of the 2016-2020 national action plan, continued a five-year assessment of action plan implementation benchmarks, including by consulting with select civil society groups, and began formulating the next action plan for 2021-2025. The government did not share assessments with the public. A lack of inter-ministerial cooperation generally hampered effective implementation. The MFA organized trainings for nearly 300 diplomatic and consular officials on prevention and protection, including among migrant workers. The Ministry of Information and Communication and the Women’s Union, along with several provincial, district, and commune-level officials, continued to organize several large-scale public awareness campaigns, reflecting the importance of awareness in the national action plan. Some efforts focused on high-risk groups, such as female migrant and agricultural workers, construction workers, communities sending migrant labor abroad, and schools in high-risk communities. Other efforts to raise awareness were more general in nature and composed of thousands of printed bulletins, articles, and reports, as well as several television reports and documentaries. Provincial- and municipal-level awareness efforts were significant, including 17,890 public information sessions attended by almost 2.5 million people; topics included preventing trafficking among students, women migrating for marriage abroad, and children using the internet, among others. The Ministry of Labor, Invalids, and Social Affairs (MOLISA), with donor funding, operated a 24-hour hotline for trafficking victims and victims of other crimes; authorities reported receiving approximately 2,520 calls in 2019, compared with 2,010 calls in 2018 and 2,700 in 2017. They also referred 35 cases to NGO and government services, compared with 30 cases in 2018 and 65 in 2017. These referrals led to the identification of 12 trafficking victims. The government continued to support English and some ethnic minority languages on the hotline.

The National Assembly adopted revisions to the labor code in November 2019 that will take effect in January 2021 and provide for the formation of independent trade unions and extend legal protections to workers without employment contracts. With assistance from an international organization, the government submitted to the National Assembly a revised law governing contract-based Vietnamese overseas workers; the law remained pending at the close of the reporting period. Labor recruitment firms, most affiliated with state-owned enterprises, and unlicensed brokers reportedly charged workers seeking overseas employment higher fees than the law allows. Many workers incurred high debts and were more at risk for forced labor, including debt-based coercion. In 2019, MOLISA inspected 55 enterprises sending workers abroad, fined 21 of them nearly 1.5 billion VND ($46,740), revoked two licenses, and resolved 120 civil complaints, all related to labor migration, compared with 91 violations in 2018. Despite these efforts, and aided by cultural norms or stigmatization that may deter victims from self-identifying, reports of migrant workers’ vulnerability to debt-based coercion continued. The coercion was facilitated by required payment of recruitment and related fees and use of irregular migration schemes, including for work on Taiwanese fishing vessels or on UK cannabis farms. MOLISA distributed thousands of handbooks on legal rights and frameworks protecting migrant workers. It also signed nine labor migration agreements aimed at preventing trafficking during the reporting period, eight with the Government of Japan for skilled and technical workers and interns and one with the Government of the UAE for domestic workers. This followed the government’s 2017 Memorandum of Cooperation with the Government of Japan to improve protections for Vietnamese participants in Japan’s Technical Intern Training Program (TITP) amid continued reports of severe exploitation of Vietnamese workers. NGOs and the media in Japan previously reported Vietnamese workers paid $7,000 to third-party brokers in Vietnam before entering the TITP program and then often had to pay $4,000 to $5,000 if they broke their contracts, trapping them in forced labor. The government continued efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. Civil society reported prosecutions for child sex tourism were rare. The government did not take steps to deny entry of known U.S. sex offenders.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported for the last five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Vietnam, and traffickers exploit victims from Vietnam abroad. Vietnamese men and women migrate abroad for work informally or through state-owned or state-regulated labor recruitment enterprises. Some recruitment companies are unresponsive to workers’ requests for assistance in situations of exploitation, and some charge excessive fees that trap workers in debt bondage. Traffickers subject victims to forced labor in construction, fishing, agriculture, mining, maritime industries, logging, and manufacturing, primarily in Taiwan, Malaysia, Republic of Korea, Laos, Japan, and to a lesser extent, some parts of Europe and the UK (including in nail salons and on cannabis farms). There are increasing reports of Vietnamese labor trafficking victims in continental Europe, the Middle East, and in Pacific maritime industries. Large-scale Vietnamese and Chinese infrastructure investment projects in neighboring countries, such as Laos, may exploit Vietnamese and foreign workers. Traffickers exploit Vietnamese women and children in sex trafficking abroad; many victims are misled by fraudulent employment opportunities and sold to brothel operators on the borders of China, Cambodia, Laos, and elsewhere in Asia. Some Vietnamese women who travel abroad for internationally brokered marriages or jobs in restaurants, massage parlors, and karaoke bars—including to China, Japan, South Korea, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, and Taiwan—are subjected to forced labor in domestic service or sex trafficking. Traffickers increasingly use the internet, gaming sites, and particularly social media to lure victims, proliferate trafficking operations, and control victims by restricting their social media access, impersonating them, and spreading disinformation online. Men often entice young women and girls with online dating relationships, persuade them to move abroad, then subject them to forced labor or sex trafficking. Some traffickers pose as police officers on social media networks to gain victims’ trust. During the migration process, European gangs and traffickers often exploit Vietnamese victims in forced labor and sex trafficking before they reach their final destination.

Within the country, traffickers are sometimes parents, family members, or small-scale networks exploiting Vietnamese men, women, and children—including street children and children with disabilities—in forced labor, although little information is available on these cases. One study suggests 5.6 percent of children in Vietnam may experience coercion or exploitation indicative of trafficking or in the context of migration, with children from rural and deprived communities particularly at risk. Traffickers exploit children and adults in forced labor in the garment sector, where workers are coerced to work through threats and intimidation. There were reports of children as young as six producing garments under conditions of forced labor in small privately owned garment factories and informal workshops, and that children as young as 12 worked while confined in government-run rehabilitation centers. Traffickers force children into street hawking and begging in major urban centers. Traffickers subject some children to forced or bonded labor in brick factories, urban family homes, and privately run rural gold mines. Sex traffickers target many children from impoverished rural areas and a rising number of women from middle class and urban settings. Traffickers increasingly exploit girls from ethnic minority communities in the northwest highlands, including in sex trafficking and forced labor in domestic service, by channeling their criminal activities through the traditional practice of bride kidnapping. Child sex tourists, reportedly from elsewhere in Asia, the UK and other countries in Europe, Australia, Canada, and the United States exploit children in Vietnam. The North Korean government may have forced North Koreans to work in Vietnam.

In 2019, the government reported it had ceased the practice of subjecting drug users to forced labor in its 105 rehabilitation centers. A 2014 legal provision requires a judicial proceeding before detention of drug users in compulsory drug rehabilitation centers and restricts detainees’ maximum workday to four hours. There were prior reports that prisoners, including political and religious dissidents, had been forced to work in agriculture, manufacturing, and hazardous industries, such as cashew processing.

Complicit Vietnamese officials, primarily at commune and village levels, allegedly facilitate trafficking or exploit victims by accepting bribes from traffickers, overlooking trafficking indicators and extorting money in exchange for reuniting victims with their families.

ZAMBIA: TIER 2 WATCH LIST

The Government of the Republic of Zambia does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making efforts to do so. These efforts included increasing law enforcement trainings, establishing two fast-track human trafficking courts, and conducting campaigns to raise awareness of human trafficking. The government slightly increased the number of prosecutions and convictions, punishing traffickers with sufficiently stringent prison sentences. However, the government did not demonstrate overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period. The government’s investigation of trafficking crimes and its funding to shelters and other victim assistance programs significantly decreased. The government did not proactively screen for trafficking indicators among vulnerable populations, including foreign nationals, and individuals involved in commercial sex—a consistent concern over the past three years. Additionally, because of the lack of screening, authorities reportedly detained and deported potential trafficking victims that appeared to be involved in smuggling. The national inter-ministerial committee lacked both leadership and consistency in overseeing national anti-trafficking efforts and trends. Therefore Zambia was downgraded to Tier 2 Watch List.

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:

- Improve efforts to implement the National Referral Mechanism (NRM) to proactively identify trafficking victims and refer them to protective services.
- Amend the trafficking law to define child sex trafficking as not requiring force, fraud, or coercion and to define trafficking as a crime that does not require movement.
- Consistently investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases.
- Screen vulnerable populations for trafficking indicators, including refugees, asylum-seekers, and foreign nationals, such as Rwandans, Chinese, and North Koreans, and refer them to appropriate services.
- Cease the penalization of trafficking victims for unlawful acts their traffickers compelled them to commit.
- Increase funding for rehabilitation services.
- Expand training for police, immigration officials, prosecutors, and judges on investigating and prosecuting trafficking crimes to ensure increased investigations and prosecutions of alleged traffickers. • Increase protective services for victims participating in the criminal justice process to prevent re-traumatization. • Establish a network of interpreters to ensure provision of interpretation services for foreign victims to deliver comprehensive legal and protective services. • Compile and make public information on trafficking cases and trends.

PROSECUTION
The government demonstrated mixed anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. The Anti-Trafficking Act of 2008 criminalized some forms of sex trafficking and labor trafficking. Inconsistent with the definition of trafficking under international law, the law only defined an offense as trafficking if it involved transnationality. Additionally, the law required a demonstration of threats, force, intimidation, or other forms of coercion to constitute a child sex trafficking offense, and therefore did not criminalize all forms of child sex trafficking. The act prescribed penalties ranging from 20 years to life imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. The government, in coordination with an international organization, concluded its review of the existing anti-trafficking act. At the end of the reporting period, draft amendments to bring the law in line with international standards were awaiting ratification by parliament.

The government investigated 13 potential trafficking cases, a significant decrease compared with 79 investigations in 2018. The government initiated four prosecutions involving eight defendants, which remained ongoing at the close of the reporting period, compared with three prosecutions involving three defendants reported in 2018. The government convicted four traffickers in 2019, compared with two convictions in 2018. Courts sentenced traffickers to imprisonment ranging from 15 to 25 years; courts sentenced one convicted juvenile trafficker to a reformatory school. The government did not report whether these cases involved sex or labor trafficking. In Lusaka Province, courts withdrew all trafficking charges against one alleged trafficker and acquitted one alleged trafficker in a case initiated in 2018. In Sesheke, courts acquitted and released four traffickers from the only trafficking case the government reported prosecuting and convicting in 2018. The government investigated one government official for alleged complicity in forced labor of a child in domestic work; however, the government did not arrest, prosecute, or convict any government officials complicit in trafficking crimes during the reporting period. In February 2019, a federal court in Maryland entered a final judgment against a former Zambian World Bank employee and her husband, a Zambian diplomat posted in the United States, in a civil lawsuit brought by their former G-5 domestic worker. The court found that the couple had violated federal and state labor law, and that the World Bank employee had breached the employment contract. The court ordered the couple to pay approximately $114,000 in damages and attorney fees. The judgment appears to remain unpaid.

The government did not conduct or request international investigations in countries that reported cases involving Zambian trafficking victims. The government assisted international organizations and local nongovernmental organizations in facilitating human trafficking training modules for law enforcement officers, criminal justice practitioners and magistrates, traditional chiefs and their assistants, and labor officers. The government coordinated training from an international organization and a local NGO for 50 criminal justice practitioners, including 26 local magistrates, resulting in the government designating two fast-track courts in Lusaka to hear human trafficking cases in addition to other cases. During the reporting period, Zambia Police Service’s Victim Support Unit designated a primary focal point to coordinate country-wide trafficking case reporting and response, including all international airports in Zambia. The law enforcement training college provided anti-trafficking training for at least 2,500 new recruits as part of regular onboarding.

PROTECTION
The government maintained inadequate victim protection efforts and decreased overall funding for victim assistance. The government identified 17 victims during the reporting period—the same number of potential victims identified during the previous reporting period. Of the victims identified, at least 11 were children; 11 were female and six were male—the majority of victims were Zambian and at least four were from the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC). The government did not report the number of adult victims it identified, compared with its identification of three adult victims during the previous reporting period. Traffickers exploited 11 victims in domestic servitude in Zambia and Namibia, four victims in cattle herding in Namibia, and two males from the DRC in forced labor in an unknown industry. The government did not report identifying any sex trafficking victims. In coordination with an international organization, the government referred all victims it identified to protective services using its NRM; however, front-line officials routinely neglected to use these methods to identify and refer victims to care, especially in cases involving foreign nationals or in commercial sex. The government repatriated two Zambian victims identified in South Africa, compared to 10 Zambian victims identified in various countries in 2018; however, the government did not provide reintegration services to repatriated victims, as the repatriation lacked close coordination with the national inter-ministerial committee and its secretariat. The government did not report coordinating the repatriation of foreign national victims identified in Zambia during the reporting period, compared to six victims from five countries in 2018. The government continued updating its current standard victim identification form to better guide front-line officials in proactively identifying trafficking victims; however, law enforcement officers did not use forms currently available.

The government partnered with international organizations to offer routine assistance to victims, including medical care and counseling; however, the government did not provide all services across Zambia. The Ministry of Community Development and Social Services operated one 40-person shelter for victims of trafficking and victims of sexual abuse in Luapula Province and other shelters in Central and Western Provinces, all of which accommodated male victims of trafficking. Shelters across the country, especially in rural areas outside Lusaka and Copperbelt Provinces, continued to lack available space, training for shelter staff, education opportunities, and integration services due to low capacity and training of victim support officers, scarce resources, and lack of funding. The government significantly decreased funding to respond to trafficking cases; the Department of Social Welfare provided 50,000 Zambian kwacha ($3,560) to support a shelter in Sesheke in 2019, compared to 1.04 million Zambian kwacha ($74,020) provided to designated shelters, homes, and school across Zambia in 2018. The government did not report spending additional funds for victim assistance in 2019, compared to spending 50,000 Zambian kwacha ($3,560) in 2018.

The government provided foreign victims of trafficking the same protective services as Zambian nationals; however, authorities did not provide interpretation services for foreign national victims. The Department of Immigration provided regularization of immigration status and temporary residency for all foreign victims in accordance with the 2008 trafficking law. Regularization of stay was not dependent on the victim’s cooperation with law enforcement, and the government offered legal alternatives to the removal of victims to countries where they may face hardship.
or retribution; however, the government did not report applying this alternative to foreign victims during the reporting period. The lack of availability of interpreters continued to be a barrier to providing timely and comprehensive care for victims, and victims often paid a fee to obtain interpretation services, despite the government reporting interpretation services are available free of charge. The government did not make progress to screen potential victims of trafficking consistently in cases that appeared to involve smuggling; the government detained, charged, or deported individuals who reportedly consented to being smuggled, including potential trafficking victims, without screening those individuals for trafficking indicators. The government regularly held potential victims in detention, alongside traffickers, while awaiting their court case. The government rarely provided opportunities for victim testimony via video or written statements and made no proactive efforts to prevent re-traumatization.

PREVENTION
The government demonstrated decreased efforts to prevent trafficking. The government had a 2018-2021 national action plan (NAP) on trafficking and mixed and irregular migration. The national inter-ministerial committee and its secretariat, which was charged with oversight of national anti-trafficking efforts, did not meet regularly, lacked a designated chair during most the reporting period, and the newly appointed chair did not attend any committee meetings. These factors hampered the committee’s ability to monitor and implement the NAP. The inter-ministerial committee, in coordination with international organizations, launched various awareness campaigns in rural and border areas to educate local communities on the recognition of human trafficking. The Ministry of Chiefs and Traditional Affairs led a similar campaign in Western Province. The National Prosecution Authority, police, and immigration officials led and participated in awareness campaigns in churches and primary schools in various rural areas in several provinces. The government did not operate a hotline for potential victims of trafficking and did not track call data related to potential victims of human trafficking from hotlines operated by nongovernmental organizations.

The government continued its partnerships in the region through routine coordination of anti-trafficking efforts with South Africa. The Ministry of Labor conducted inspections and investigations of labor brokers on a regular basis throughout the country to regulate recruitment practices and prevent fraudulent job offers that may lead to exploitation. The Employment Act set forth requirements for the regulation of labor brokers and prohibited labor brokers from charging prospective employees for any services rendered. The labor ministry conducted inspections and investigations of labor brokers on a regular basis throughout the country to regulate recruitment practices and prevent fraudulent job offers that may lead to exploitation. During 2019, the Ministry of Labor employed 160 labor inspectors, compared to 155 employed the previous year. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts. The government did not provide anti-trafficking training to its diplomatic personnel. The government trained peacekeepers on anti-trafficking prior to deployment.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Zambia, and traffickers exploit victims from Zambia abroad. Most trafficking occurs within the country’s borders and involves traffickers exploiting women and children from rural areas in cities in domestic servitude or forced labor in agriculture, textile production, mining, construction, small businesses such as bakeries, and forced begging. Jerabo gangs may force Zambian children to engage in illegal mining operations, such as loading stolen copper or crushing rocks. Orphans and street children remain vulnerable to trafficking; however, children of village families are also at risk of trafficking because sending children to the city for work is perceived to confer status and may entice families to send a child to the city without verifying the environment. Truck drivers exploit Zambian boys and girls in sex trafficking in towns along the Zimbabwean and Tanzanian borders, and miners exploit them in Solwezi. Traffickers exploit Zambian boys in sex trafficking in Zambia and exploit women and girls in sex trafficking in South Africa. Domestically, extended families and trusted family acquaintances facilitate trafficking. Zambians from the depressed rural areas in the Western Province are coerced into forced labor in Namibia.

Traffickers exploit women and children from neighboring countries in forced labor and sex trafficking in Zambia. Traffickers lure Rwandan women to Zambia with promises of refugee status, coerce them into registering as DRC nationals seeking refugee status in Zambia, and subsequently exploit them in sex trafficking and threaten them with physical abuse and reporting them to immigration officials for fraudulent refugee claims. Traffickers increasingly exploit victims from Tanzania and Malawi in the Zambian timber industry. North Koreans working in Zambia may have been forced to work by the North Korean government. Chinese traffickers bring in Chinese women and girls for sexual exploitation in brothels and massage parlors in Lusaka; traffickers use front companies posing as travel agencies to lure Chinese victims and coordinate with Zambian facilitators and middlemen. Chinese nationals are increasingly exploited in forced labor in Chinese-owned companies in the construction, mining, and service sectors. Indian-Zambian nationals operating in India facilitated illegal adoption of Indian children for the purpose of exploiting them in domestic servitude in Zambia.

ZIMBABWE: TIER 2

The Government of Zimbabwe does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The government demonstrated overall increasing efforts compared to the previous reporting period; therefore Zimbabwe remained on Tier 2. These efforts included investigating and prosecuting more traffickers and increasing training for law enforcement and the judiciary. The government identified and referred to care more victims, including one internal trafficking victim exploited in Zimbabwe, and coordinated with international organizations and civil society to ensure all victims received services. In partnership with an international organization, the government coordinated with two foreign governments to facilitate the repatriation of three trafficking victims. The government approved and adopted a national action plan to combat trafficking and conducted awareness-raising activities throughout the country. However, the government did not meet the minimum standards in several key areas. The draft amendments to the 2014 Trafficking in Persons Act to bring the law in line with international standards, remained pending at the close of the reporting period. The government convicted fewer trafficking cases compared to the previous year, and the backlog of trafficking cases from 2016 remained, as the government reported no progress on those investigations. The government did not provide adequate funding to its NGO partners on which it relied to provide protective services to victims. Women, men, children, and migrants may have been victims of forced labor or sex trafficking, and North Koreans working in Zimbabwe may have been forced to work by the North Korean government.
ZIMBABWE

PRIORITIZED RECOMMENDATIONS:
Amend the anti-trafficking law to criminalize all forms of trafficking in line with the 2000 UN TIP Protocol. • Provide financial or in-kind support to NGO service providers. • Expedite trafficking cases to address the significant backlog of cases dating back to 2016. • Implement and allocate sufficient resources to the National Action Plan (NAP) to combat trafficking. • Increase efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes proactively, including complicit government officials. • Train officials to proactively identify trafficking victims among vulnerable populations such as migrant workers and foreign nationals including North Koreans, and refer them to appropriate services. • Expand law enforcement training on investigative techniques and victim identification within Zimbabwe. • Allocate adequate funding for law enforcement to carry out investigations proactively. • Train prosecutors and judges on trafficking and trafficking-related legislation. • Establish safe houses for trafficking victims in each province. • Develop mutual legal assistance treaties (MLATs) and other agreements to facilitate information gathering and sharing with foreign governments.

PROSECUTION
The government had mixed anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. Zimbabwean law criminalized some forms of sex trafficking and labor trafficking. Inconsistent with international law, the 2014 Trafficking in Persons Act defined trafficking in persons as a movement-based crime and did not adequately define “exploitation.” The 2014 act criminalized the involuntary transport of a person and the voluntary transport for an unlawful purpose, into, outside, or within Zimbabwe. The focus on transport and the inadequate definition of “exploitation” left Zimbabwe without comprehensive prohibitions of trafficking crimes. The law prescribed penalties of 10 years’ life imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking crimes, was commensurate with penalties for other serious crimes, such as rape. Zimbabwe’s Labor Relations Amendment Act criminalized forced labor and prescribed penalties of up to two years’ imprisonment, which were not sufficiently stringent. The Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act criminalized procuring a person for unlawful sexual conduct, inside or outside of Zimbabwe and prescribed penalties of up to two years’ imprisonment; these penalties were not sufficiently stringent when applied to cases of sex trafficking. The act also criminalized coercing or inducing anyone to engage in unlawful sexual conduct with another person by threat or intimidation, prescribing sufficiently stringent penalties of one to five years’ imprisonment. During the previous reporting period, the government, in partnership with an international organization, finalized a draft Trafficking in Persons Act Amendment Bill; however, it made no progress in advancing the bill during the reporting period.

The government investigated seven potential trafficking cases, compared with investigating two potential cases of forced labor in the previous reporting period. The government initiated six prosecutions, compared with two in 2018. One case involved an alleged trafficker facing more than 20 counts of trafficking for luring victims to Kuwait and exploiting them in forced labor and sex trafficking; the defendant absconded during his trial and remained at large at the close of the reporting period. The other five prosecutions remained pending. An international organization reported the government charged traffickers in three additional cases with rape and assault rather than trafficking due to a lack of familiarity with the anti-trafficking law. The government did not convict any traffickers, compared with one conviction during the previous reporting period. The government did not report making progress on any additional cases during the reporting period despite the willingness of many trafficking victims to testify, including the possible 20 cases initiated in 2016 involving Zimbabwean victims exploited in Kuwait, of which the government has only prosecuted three.

The government trained 264 detectives on the anti-trafficking law and victim protection. The Zimbabwe Republic Police incorporated a module on the anti-trafficking law for police recruit training in September 2019 and delivered the training to six classes of new officers. In collaboration with an international organization, the government trained 50 immigration officials on trafficking. The government trained magistrates on trafficking in November 2019. Despite these trainings, observers continued to report the government lacked a systematic procedure to investigate cases, and immigration officials lacked capacity to detect and investigate trafficking. In addition, many investigations lacked sufficient evidence to build strong cases. Unlike sexual offense cases, which were typically expedited in the courts, trafficking cases were not treated with the same urgency and often languished on the docket for years. The government did not report any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government officials complicit in human trafficking offenses; however, observers reported widespread corruption during the previous reporting period, including magistrates, judges, and senior government officials who allegedly undermined judicial independence including by giving farms and homes to judges.

PROTECTION
The government demonstrated mixed protection efforts. The government identified 52 victims for assistance, compared with 10 victims identified by officials, international organizations and NGOs in the previous reporting period. The government referred all 52 victims to international organizations for reintegration support, including 29 females and three males, 28 of whom had been exploited in forced labor, three in sex trafficking, and 21 in unreported types of trafficking. Traffickers exploited the forced labor victims primarily in Kuwait, but also in China, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, and Botswana. An international organization reported that in addition to these 32 victims, the government referred one Zimbabwean victim to an NGO shelter that operated 11 shelters for women in eight of 10 provinces throughout the country, two children to a children’s home for protective services, including counseling and medical care, and two cases to the government-run shelter in Harare. Another international NGO reported the government referred an additional 15 victims to its shelter in Rutengga. This NGO also reported identifying 522 potential victims through its work monitoring transit points, including bus stations, rail depots, and border areas. South African law enforcement officers reported identifying 30 Zimbabwean women in brothels in Mpumalanga province as potential sex trafficking victims. NGO shelters provided shelter for both male and female victims of gender-based violence, trafficking, and domestic violence. The NGOs that provided protective services did not receive funding from the government for at least the second consecutive year and struggled to operate without such support. While the 2014 Trafficking in Persons Act required the government to establish centers in each of Zimbabwe’s 10 provinces to provide counseling, rehabilitation, and reintegration services, these centers have not been established. In partnership with an international organization, the government facilitated the repatriation of three trafficking victims from Nigeria and South Africa. The Government of Botswana facilitated the repatriation...
The government, in partnership with an international organization and other stakeholders, adopted and launched a National Referral Mechanism (NRM), which outlined standard operating procedures in the identification, referral, and assistance of trafficking victims. The Anti-Trafficking Inter-Ministerial Committee (ATIMC) drafted and adopted implementing regulations, which gave legal force to key procedures set out in the NRM, empowered provincial operational task teams, and defined clear roles and responsibilities for front-line responders. During the reporting period, the technical steering committee on the protections of victims of trafficking, led by the Ministry of Public Service, Labor, and Social Welfare (MPSLSW), did not meet. The MPSLSW had a system whereby each potential trafficking case reported was handled jointly by an NGO and a Department of Social Welfare caseworker. The government encouraged victims to cooperate in the investigation and prosecution of trafficking cases. The government implemented a comprehensive system for victim-witnesses, which included police units, courts, health services, and a referral system that were more victim-centered. Courts had a separate room for victims to testify separately from their alleged perpetrators, and victims could choose to testify via video; however, observers reported not every court had access to the necessary equipment, especially in rural areas, and the government did not report whether any victims utilized these services during the reporting period. The government trained prosecutors, probation officers, and magistrates to treat victims sensitively, handle cases quickly, and refer victims to post- trial support services. In addition, the government trained health service providers to collect evidence for criminal investigations, prepare medical affidavits, and offer immediate and long-term psycho-social support and health care. The government did not have legal alternatives to removal to countries in which victims would face retribution or hardship; however, the government did not identify any foreign victims during the reporting period.

PREVENTION

The government maintained efforts to prevent trafficking. In coordination with international organizations, the ATIMC approved and adopted the Trafficking in Persons National Action Plan (NAP) 2019-2021 in July 2019. However, the government had not launched the NAP at the close of the reporting period. The government did not include civil society actors in the development of the NAP. The ATIMC met only once during the reporting period. In 2018, the ATIMC adopted guidelines for engagement between the government and civil society actors, which will establish a National Coordinating Forum to provide a platform for such engagement. In partnership with international organizations, the ATIMC developed the capacity of its seven provincial task teams with targeted trainings. In partnership with an international organization, the government set up anti-trafficking booths at the annual Zimbabwe International Trade Fair and the Harare Agricultural Show, which drew thousands of participants; officials distributed educational materials and hosted focus group discussions. In partnership with an international NGO, police officers conducted two awareness-raising workshops with communities within Rutenga and Beitbridge. In addition, the Victim Friendly Police Unit carried out extensive awareness campaigns educating communities against child labor, human trafficking, and sexual exploitation. Although the government funded awareness-raising activities, it did not allocate adequate resources to fully implement the NAP during the reporting period and relied on funds from international organizations to implement some of the activities. The government continued to participate in the Southern African Development Community’s (SADC) regional data collection tool by uploading information about trafficking cases, victim and trafficker profiles, and sharing information with countries in the region. The government continued to screen companies that employed foreign nationals and prohibited proxy employment permit applications. The government did not provide anti-trafficking training to its diplomatic personnel. The government did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Zimbabwe, and traffickers exploit victims from Zimbabwe abroad. Traffickers exploit women and girls from Zimbabwean towns bordering South Africa, Mozambique, and Zambia in forced labor, including domestic servitude, and sex trafficking in brothels catering to long-distance truck drivers on both sides of the border. Zimbabwe is also a transit country for trafficked Somalis and Ethiopians en route to South Africa. There were reports of traffickers subjecting children from Mozambique to forced labor in street vending in Zimbabwe, including in Mbabane. Additionally, the practice of ngozi, giving a family member to another family to avenge the spirits of a murdered relative, creates a vulnerability to trafficking. North Korean workers may have been forced to work by the North Korean government.

Traffickers lure Zimbabwean women and men into exploitative labor situations in agriculture, construction, information technology, and hospitality largely in neighboring countries; some subsequently become victims of forced labor, and some women become victims of sex trafficking. Traffickers exploit women in domestic servitude, forced labor, and sex trafficking in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. There were previous reports of Zimbabwean women lured to China and the Middle East for work, where they are vulnerable to trafficking. There were reports of traffickers luring Zimbabwean students to Cyprus and elsewhere with false promises for education via scholarship schemes, where they are exploited in forced labor and sex trafficking. Many Zimbabwean adult and child migrants enter South Africa with the assistance of taxi drivers who transport them to the border at Beitbridge, or nearby unofficial crossing locations, where traffickers exploit them in labor and sex trafficking. Some migrants are transferred to criminal gangs that subject them to abuse, including sex trafficking in Musina, Pretoria, Johannesburg, or Durban. Traffickers exploit some Zimbabwean men, women, and children in South Africa to months of forced labor without pay, on farms, at construction sites, in factories, mines, and other businesses. Traffickers transport men, women, and children, predominantly from East Africa, through Zimbabwe en route to South Africa; some of these migrants are trafficking victims. Refugees from Somalia and Democratic Republic of the Congo reportedly travel from Zimbabwe’s Tongogara Refugee Camp to Harare, where traffickers exploit them and, in some cases, coerce them into prostitution. Traffickers force Chinese nationals to work in restaurants in Zimbabwe. Chinese construction and mining companies in Zimbabwe reportedly employ practices indicative of forced labor, including verbal, physical, and sexual abuse, as well as various means of coercion to induce work in unsafe or otherwise undesirable conditions.

SPECIAL CASE: LIBYA

Libya is a Special Case for the fifth consecutive year. The Libyan Government of National Accord (GNA) struggled to govern large swaths of Libyan territory, as it did not exercise control in several parts of the country. The judicial system was not fully functioning, as courts in major cities throughout the country have not been operational since 2014. Violence heightened during the reporting period, as conflict escalated between the Tripoli-based GNA and the self-styled Libyan National Army (LNA), which has sought to establish a rival government in eastern Libya and initiated an government-aligned militias that were allegedly complicit in not publicly report statistics on prosecutions or convictions crimes, generally operated with impunity. The government did aware of human rights violations including human trafficking function throughout the reporting period, were mandated to raise formal training and with varying degrees of accountability. The limited policing capacity hindered the government's ability to pursue these trafficking cases. Law enforcement functions, was limited in its ability to carry out to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes.

Libya’s criminal judicial system was not fully functioning in 2019, nor were there administrative units and courts specifically dedicated to overseeing human trafficking cases. Law enforcement and judicial authorities often lacked the knowledge and understanding of the crime of human trafficking. The Ministry of Interior (MOI), which was nominally responsible for anti-trafficking enforcement efforts, was limited in its ability to carry out anti-trafficking operations during the reporting period. Although entities such as the Ministry of Justice (MOJ) and Office of the Attorney General issued arrest warrants for alleged perpetrators of various crimes including trafficking during the reporting period, limited policing capacity hindered the government’s ability to pursue these trafficking cases. Law enforcement functions sometimes fell to disparate armed groups, which received salaries from the government and performed their activities without formal training and with varying degrees of accountability. The MOI and MOJ’s human rights directorates, which continued to function throughout the reporting period, were mandated to raise awareness of human rights violations including human trafficking crimes; however, international NGOs reported the directorates lacked the capacity to carry out their mandates. Perpetrators committing human rights abuses, including human trafficking crimes, generally operated with impunity. The government did not publicly report statistics on prosecutions or convictions of trafficking offenders, including government officials and government-aligned militias that were allegedly complicit in trafficking crimes. However in October 2019, the media reported the Attorney General and Counter Terrorism Force announced the arrest of two suspects for alleged involvement in human trafficking operations. The government did not report if it prosecuted or convicted any individuals involved in the investigation of 205 suspected traffickers that the attorney general’s office initiated in 2018, nor did it report if any of the 35 arrest warrants that it issued in January 2019 resulted in trafficking prosecutions or convictions.

International observers continued to report complicity of government officials involved in human trafficking and migrant smuggling operations, including Libyan Coast Guard (LCG) officials, immigration officers, security officials, Ministry of Defense (MOD) officials, members of armed groups formally integrated into state institutions, as well as officials from the MOI and MOI’s Department to Combat Illegal Migration (DCIM). Various armed groups, militias, and criminal networks infiltrated the administrative ranks of the government and abused their positions to engage in illicit activities, including human trafficking and alleged child soldier recruitment and use. Several credible sources continued to report that DCIM detention center guards and administrative staff forced detained migrants to work at these detention centers and at third locations, such as farms and construction sites. There were anecdotal reports that DCIM staff at detention centers contracted armed groups and militias—some of whom likely had ties to human trafficking networks—to provide security services at individual detention centers. Anecdotal reports also suggested staff in some GNA-affiliated migrant detention centers in western Libya sold detainees to local armed groups to transport and clean weapons. There were also numerous allegations in mid-2019 that forces affiliated with the Special Deterrence Force (SDF), which nominally operated under the MOI, recruited and used child soldiers. In western Libya, numerous armed groups, including some GNA-aligned, continued to be involved in the trafficking of detained migrants and benefited from extortion payments sent by the migrants’ family members for the migrants’ release.
In addition, some LCG units, which were under the authority of the MOD, were allegedly composed of former human traffickers and smugglers or coordinated with groups involved in human trafficking, human smuggling, and other crimes. During the reporting period, the LCG unit in the city of Zawiya continued to have extensive links to the leader of the al-Nasr Martyrs Brigade militia—notorious for committing human rights violations—who ran the Zawiya migrant detention center. Militia members operating the detention center reportedly physically abused detained migrants and sold some female migrants into sexual slavery; in late 2019, the center was transformed into an army barracks for militias, further endangering detained migrants and trafficking victims. In 2018, the commander of the Zawiya LCG was sanctioned by the UN for perpetrating violence against migrants and the GNA subsequently suspended him from his duties as the LCG commander. Credible sources reported, however, that he continued to work on LCG missions in Zawiya port in 2019 and the GNA did not report investigating the official further.

The government arrested, detained, or otherwise punished victims for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, such as immigration and prostitution violations and alleged affiliation to armed groups. As of February 2020, an international organization reported DCIM managed 11 operational detention facilities where it arbitrarily and indefinitely detained male, female, and child migrants and refugees—many of whom were unidentified trafficking victims—in western Libya. During the reporting period, the MOI pledged to close three migrant detention centers and to release or repatriate the detainees; however, by the end of 2019, DCIM had emptied only one of these centers.
DCIM-run detention facilities suffered from massive overcrowding, lack of basic infrastructure, dire sanitation problems, and food

GOVERNMENT EFFORTS
Lack of institutional capacity, as well as lack of Libyan law enforcement, customs, and military personnel, especially along its borders, hindered authorities’ efforts to combat human trafficking crimes. Libyan law criminalized some forms of sex trafficking, but did not criminalize labor trafficking. Articles 418, 419, and 420 of the penal code criminalized some forms of sex trafficking involving women and prescribed penalties of up to 10 years’ imprisonment and a fine between 100 and 500 Libyan dinars ($72-$360), which were sufficiently stringent and commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. However, inconsistent with international law, the definition of trafficking within these provisions required transnational movement of the victim and did not criminalize sex trafficking acts that were induced through fraudulent or coercive means. The law did not criminalize sex trafficking involving adult male victims. Article 425 criminalized slavery and prescribed penalties of five to 15 years’ imprisonment. Article 426 criminalized the buying and selling of slaves and prescribed penalties of up to 10 years’ imprisonment.
These penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes.
shortages. Detainees, including trafficking victims, had limited to no access to medical care, legal aid, and other forms of protective services. Detainees did not have access to immigration courts or other forms of due process. DCIM-employed guards continued to subject detainees to severe abuse, forced labor, unlawful killings, and rape and other forms of sexual violence. No DCIM detention centers employed female guards, except for the Tariq al-Sekka detention center; the lack of female personnel at the majority of detention centers and climate of impunity for sexual violence contributed to the increased vulnerability of female detainees to abuse and exploitation. Additionally, DCIM held migrants at detention facilities that were in close range of armed hostilities in Tripoli, but it did not protect detainees from the escalating violence. For example, in July 2019, an LNA-aligned airstrike hit a DCIM-run center in Tajoura municipality, killing at least 53 migrants, including six children; the DCIM-run center was adjacent to a weapons storage warehouse. There were reports that GNA armed forces used some detention centers as training grounds and to store weapons and equipment, further endangering detainees and trafficking victims. Moreover, in January 2020, the Deputy Director of the DCIM—who was affiliated with Tripoli-based armed militias—mobilized hundreds of DCIM guards at a site adjacent to a facility operated by an international organization sheltering refugees and asylum-seekers awaiting resettlement, some of whom were likely trafficking survivors. This action placed this population in grave danger and led the international organization to temporarily close the facility for fear that it would be targeted in the LNA’s ongoing offensive on Tripoli. In April 2019, the MOI reported it arrested at least seven children who were allegedly fighting for LNA-aligned units on the outskirts of Tripoli; the MOI did not report making efforts to screen the children for trafficking or refer them to civil society actors for protection services.

The government did not have any policy structures, institutional capacity, widespread political will, or resources to proactively identify and protect trafficking victims among vulnerable groups, such as foreign migrants, refugees, and asylum-seekers; women and girls in commercial sex; and children recruited and used by government-aligned militias or other armed groups. The government did not provide foreign trafficking victims with legal alternatives to their removal to countries where they could face hardship or retribution. Libyan authorities continued to cooperate with international organizations to repatriate, resettle, or evacuate some migrants, which likely included unidentified trafficking victims. The government allowed an international organization to be present at some of the 10 official disembarkation points along the western coastline where migrants arrived after the LCG intercepted or rescued them at sea; however, the government’s procedures for disembarked migrants remained unclear and put migrants further at risk of exploitation. During the reporting period, the government continued to cooperate with international organizations, international NGOs, and diplomatic missions to facilitate the provision of humanitarian assistance to refugees and migrants, a population highly vulnerable to trafficking, in DCIM-run detention centers. The government continued to operate a limited number of social rehabilitation centers for women in commercial sex and victims of sex trafficking and other forms of sexual abuse; however, these centers reportedly operated as de facto prisons, and international observers continued to document incidents of abuse in these centers.

Libya is a party to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol, but the government lacked the institutional capacity and resources to prevent human trafficking. Alleged government complicity further exacerbated the overall human trafficking problem in the country and the region. While some DCIM officials acknowledged the scope of the human trafficking problem in Libya, in November 2019, the Libyan Deputy Prime Minister stated in a media interview that there was “no slavery in Libya” in response to a question regarding allegations of forced labor in a migrant detention center. The GNA did not have a national coordinating body responsible for combating human trafficking. The government did not conduct any public anti-trafficking awareness campaigns, nor did it take actions to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts or child sex tourism. The government did not adopt any public anti-trafficking awareness campaigns, nor did it take actions to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts or child sex tourism. The government did not adopt any public anti-trafficking awareness campaigns, nor did it take actions to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts or child sex tourism. point for migrants, including unaccompanied minors, crossing the Mediterranean to Europe from North Africa; however, the numbers of sea departures from Libya to Europe continued to decrease throughout 2019 and over previous years. Elements of the LCG reportedly work with armed groups and other criminals, including traffickers, to exploit migrants for profit. There are financial incentives for smugglers and traffickers to prevent the disembarkation of migrants transiting the Mediterranean and to re-transit migrants back to Libya for detention and further exploitation. Throughout 2019, due to violence and localized clashes, traditional smuggling and trafficking routes became more clandestine, creating greater risks and dangers for migrants.

Various armed groups, criminal gangs and networks, tribal groups, smugglers, and traffickers, have cooperated and competed in the smuggling and trafficking of migrants to and through Libya, while carrying out serious human rights abuses and violations against migrants, including torture, sexual abuse and exploitation, rape, extortion, ransom, theft, and forced labor. International organizations report smugglers and traffickers trade migrants and refugees within illicit networks, while holding them in inhumane conditions. Highly organized trafficking networks subject migrants to forced labor and sex trafficking through fraudulent recruitment, confiscation of identity and travel documents, withholding or non-payment of wages, debt-based coercion, and verbal, physical, and sexual abuse. In some cases, migrants reportedly pay smuggling fees to reach Tripoli, but once they cross the Libyan border they are sometimes abandoned in southern cities or the desert where they are susceptible to severe forms of abuse and human trafficking.

Several credible sources continue to report that migrants held in detention centers controlled by both the DCIM and non-state armed groups and militias were subjected to severe abuse, rampant sexual violence, and forced labor. As of March 2020, international organizations estimated there were more than 1,400 migrants and refugees in DCIM-run detention centers, which was less than the approximately 5,000 detained migrants and refugees in early 2019. There were an unknown number of migrants and refugees detained in informal detention facilities across the country affiliated to various non-state armed groups, including the LNA. An unknown number of migrants were also held in criminal prisons affiliated with the MOJ, MOI, and MOD. Private employers and DCIM officials use detained migrants for forced labor in domestic work, garbage collection, construction, road paving, and agriculture. According to international observers, detention center operators also forced migrants to provide ancillary services to armed groups, such as offloading and transporting weapons, cooking food, cleaning, and clearing unexploded ordnance (UXO). Once the work is completed, employers and detention center officials return the migrants to detention. In some cases, detained migrants were forced to work in exchange for their release from prison. In November 2017, an international media outlet released a video depicting unidentified individuals selling African migrants reportedly for labor in an undisclosed location in Libya. Furthermore, an international organization reported in 2017 that many militias in Libya fill their ranks with migrants from Niger, Nigeria, and Chad to perform labor or to serve in other non-combat roles.

There is a reportedly high prevalence of sexual assault and other forms of sexual violence and exploitation of female migrants either along the migration routes to Libya or in DCIM-run and militia-run detention facilities in Libya; perpetrators of sexual violence against female migrants include various armed groups, smugglers, traffickers, and MOI officials. International NGOs also report that migrant men and boys are increasingly vulnerable to rape and other forms of sexual abuse. Prostitution rings reportedly subject sub-Saharan women and girls to sex trafficking in brothels, particularly in the towns of Ubari, Sebha, and Murzuq in southern Libya; Nigerian women and girls are at increased risk of sex trafficking in Libya. According to a European NGO, Nigerian girls recruit Nigerian girls from rural regions of the country and facilitate the transportation of the girls through Libya for sex trafficking in Italy and other European countries.

SPECIAL CASE: SOMALIA

Somalia remains a Special Case for the 18th consecutive year. The country continued to face protracted conflict, insecurity, and ongoing humanitarian crises during the reporting period. The Federal Government of Somalia (FGS) controlled its capital city, Mogadishu, and Federal Member State (FMS) governments retained control over most local capitals across the country. The self-declared independent region of Somaliland and the Puntland FMS retained control of security and law enforcement in their respective regions. The FGS had limited influence outside Mogadishu. The al-Shabaab terrorist group continued to occupy and control rural areas and maintained operational freedom of movement in many other areas in south-central Somalia, which it used as a base to exploit the local population by collecting illegal taxes, conducting indiscriminate attacks against civilian and civilian infrastructure across the country, and perpetrating human trafficking. The FGS focused on capacity building and securing Mogadishu and government facilities from attacks by al-Shabaab. The sustained insurgency by al-Shabaab continued to be the main obstacle to the government’s ability to address human trafficking. The government continued to modestly improve capacity to address most crimes; however, it demonstrated minimal efforts in all regions on prosecution, protection, and prevention of trafficking during the reporting year.

GOVERNMENT EFFORTS

The FGS, Somaliland, and Puntland authorities sustained minimal efforts to combat trafficking during the reporting period. Due to the protracted campaign to degrade al-Shabaab and establish law and order in Somalia, law enforcement, prosecutorial personnel, and judicial offices remained understaffed, undertrained, and lacked capacity to effectively enforce anti-trafficking laws. The FGS continued to lack a comprehensive legal framework to address human trafficking. The pre-1991 penal code—applicable at the federal and regional levels—criminalized labor trafficking and some forms of sex trafficking. Article 455 criminalized slavery, prescribing penalties of five to 20 years’ imprisonment. Article 464 criminalized forced labor, prescribing penalties of six months’ to five years’ imprisonment. Article 457 criminalized the transferring, disposing, taking possession or holding of a person, and prescribed penalties of three to 12 years’ imprisonment. All of these penalties were sufficiently stringent. Article 408(1) criminalized compelled prostitution of a person through violence or threats, prescribing penalties of two to six years’ imprisonment, which were sufficiently stringent but not commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. The provisional constitution prohibited slavery, servitude, trafficking, and forced labor under Article 14. Article 29(6) under the provisional constitution prohibited the use of children in armed conflict. In September 2017, Somaliland endorsed a draft human trafficking law designed in consultation with an international organization; however, the Somaliland Parliament did not pass it by the close of the current reporting period and relied predominantly on immigration legislation to prosecute trafficking crimes. In November 2017, Puntland ratified a human trafficking legislative framework after three years of consultations with an international organization. The legal framework was composed of new penal and criminal laws. procedure codes and a law that specifically prohibited trafficking, despite minimal reporting from the FGS, similar to previous years, neither the federal nor the regional levels gathered or shared comprehensive statistics on investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of or related to trafficking. During the reporting year, the Attorney General’s Office reported 17 arrests related to immigration violations and alleged human trafficking crimes. Additionally, in January 2020, authorities detained one Somali man outside the Aden Abdulle International Airport on suspicion of human trafficking; at the close of the reporting period the investigation remained ongoing. In Somaliland, immigration officials reported they arrested six individuals in connection with an alleged dual trafficking and smuggling case, all of whom awaited trial at the end of the year. According to an international organization, Puntland authorities registered two trafficking cases involving six suspects during the reporting period but did not report details about either case. The authorities did not report efforts to investigate, prosecute, or convict any official for involvement in trafficking or criminal activities related to trafficking during the reporting period. The government did not report criminal action against military officials for the unlawful recruitment and use of children during the year. The Somali Police Force Criminal Investigations Department (CID) maintained a specialized anti-trafficking and migrant smuggling unit, supported by an international organization, which was staffed by an unspecified number of police officers and mandated to investigate potential cases of trafficking. The unit did not report investigating any potential trafficking cases during the year, whereas it registered 43 investigations the year prior. In April 2019, an international organization provided an advanced training course on trafficking topics for CID police officers from Mogadishu, South West State, and Puntland.

The government’s lead anti-trafficking official remained the Special Envoy for Children’s and Migrants’ Rights, who steered a staff of five under the Office of the Prime Minister and was responsible for coordinating efforts on migration, trafficking, and reintegration across federal and regional governmental jurisdictions. While the Office of the Special Envoy served as the Secretariat, and the FGS Ministry of Women and Human Rights and representatives from Galmudug served as the co-chairs of a technical task force on trafficking. During the reporting year, the task force met monthly and participated in an induction training on trafficking and smuggling and on a whole-of-government approach to curbing the crime. While anti-trafficking coordination efforts modestly improved during the reporting period, a lack of technical expertise and limited civilian judicial and overarching capacity hindered the Secretariat’s efforts to develop and coordinate effective anti-trafficking policy. The task force held an awareness-raising event along the border area with Kenya to highlight the International World Trafficking Day.

Similar to previous years, the government did not systematically gather or report statistics for trafficking victims, and reporting remained largely anecdotal. The government did not have standardized procedures to identify or refer trafficking victims to protective services at any level, and all levels of government relied fully on international organizations and NGOs to provide victim assistance, protective provisions, and reintegration services. The FGS did not possess sufficient financial assets to provide direct services or auxiliary support to organizations assisting victims and vulnerable populations. International NGOs provided the Somaliland Immigration and Border Control agency with two buses to transport migrants and trafficking victims from remote to more populated areas where they could be provided with services. Trafficking victims in Somaliland received assistance at an international organization-run Migration Response Center (MRC) in Hargeisa and another MRC in Bosasso in Puntland until the MRC could reunite them with their respective families. Neither facility was dedicated solely to trafficking victims and instead provided services broadly for the vulnerable transiting migrant population. However, the international organization responsible for screening at MRCs reported some potential trafficking victims comprised an undetermined proportion of individuals who received assistance there. Puntland authorities maintained a regional referral mechanism for trafficking victims with support from an international organization; however, the extent to which officials employed it during the current period was unclear. Victim support varied significantly across the country, and specialized care was sporadic due to limited practitioners in-country, and, beyond the scope of the MRCs, victims had irregular access to protective provisions. Authorities routinely detained potential victims for immigration violations, to include possession of fraudulent visas; however, the government allegedly screened some detained individuals for trafficking at ports of entry, particularly in Mogadishu. In Somaliland, immigration officials claimed to have identified more than 300 Ethiopian migrants who were potential trafficking victims during the reporting period; it was unclear if the regional government provided any with care or repatriation. The government did not have a legal alternative to the removal of foreign trafficking victims from Somalia to countries where they may face hardship or retribution.

Authorities across Somalia demonstrated minimal efforts to prevent trafficking during the year. During the reporting year, the Office of the Special Envoy developed a strategic, quasi-national action plan that outlined three priorities: policy, coordination, and outreach. The FGS held multiple campaigns across Somalia to elevate awareness and promote the roles of first responders in identifying and referring victims to relevant authorities. In cooperation with an international organization, the government organized an anti-trafficking event in Galkayo, which reached an unknown number of individuals. During the reporting period, the FGS, in consultation with organizations representing employers and employees, finalized a national employment policy to guide the creation of jobs, and a draft national labor code on responsible labor practices, to include the prohibition of forced labor. Authorities across Somalia did not make any discernible efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex. The government did not provide anti-trafficking training for its diplomatic personnel. Somalia was not a party to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol.

The dire security situation and restrictions on movement of humanitarian actors continued to hamper detailed child soldier reporting during the year. However, there were continued reports of the Somali National Army (SNA), Somali National Police (SPF), Galmudug Forces, Galmudug Police, Jubaland Forces, clan militias, the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM), and al-Shabaab unlawfully recruiting and using both male and female child soldiers (between ages 10 and 17), with the latter entity committing the vast majority of violations. An international organization documented the recruitment and use of more than 450 children (including seven girls) by all actors in the conflict between April and September 2019, and 84 percent of such cases were attributed to an upsurge in an aggressive child recruitment campaign by al-Shabaab militants, with retaliation against communities refusing to hand over children. From September to December 2019, an international organization verified the recruitment and use of more than 260 children; al-Shabaab remained the main perpetrator, followed by the SPF, SNA, clan militia, and Galmudug Forces. During the previous reporting period, an international organization documented the recruitment and use of 1,850 children; the marked decline of the current year’s verified numbers was directly attributable to reduced monitoring and reporting capacities of the international body due to denied access to conflict zones and other regions across the country. According to an international organization, all alleged state and non-state actors used 69 percent of children for unknown purposes in the conflict, 15 percent of children as combatants in hostilities, and 16 percent of children in support roles such as security escorts, checkpoint guards, messengers, and cleaners. One boy, approximately 14-16 years old and recruited by the SPF, was reportedly seen by an international observer armed and dressed in uniform while controlling traffic and directing vehicles alongside several other police officers at Warta Nabada district in Mogadishu/Banadir.

The government continued to implement the 2012 action plan to end the unlawful recruitment and use of children by the SNA in piecemeal fashion; the FGS retained limited ability to command and control the SNA and allied militias, especially those outside of Mogadishu. However, reflective of its intent to accelerate implementation of the aforementioned action plans, in September 2019 the FGS adopted a detailed roadmap to strengthen child protection and identify areas for targeted improvement. In accordance with this roadmap, the Child Protection Unit of the Ministry of Defense, in collaboration with an international NGO, conducted a three-day workshop for 40 SNA soldiers based in Hudur, Bakol in Southwest region, to train and raise awareness on the prevention of recruitment and use of children during armed conflict. It conducted a similar training in Dhusmarmeeb for 40 armed state actors. Furthermore, the Ministry of Women and Human Rights Development facilitated trainings on child rights and child protection for a total number of 261 participants from the security sector, inter-ministerial staff, members of parliament, and civil society. The Minister of Justice and Judiciary Affairs, jointly with international organizations, launched the campaign “Act to Protect Children Affected by Conflict” during an event held to commemorate the Day of the African Child. Finally, UN officials together with key government counterparts conducted three trainings for 89 military officers, judges, prosecutors, police investigators, and civil society workers in Jowhar, Mogadishu, and Beledweyne on the protection of children affected by armed conflict. Despite these trainings, international organizations continued to report government forces detained some children for their actual or alleged association with al-Shabaab and did not apply juvenile justice standards or adhere to international obligations. Specifically, from April to December 2019, one international organization reported Somali federal and regional security authorities (primarily the police) arrested and detained more than 115 boys aged 11-17. In addition, SPF, SNA, Jubaland forces, and Galmudug forces arrested and detained approximately 60 boys aged 11-17 for their alleged association with armed groups. Purportedly, officials released 63 percent of the children at a later stage, while the other 22 remained in detention.

In early 2019, an international organization supported a consultative meeting on the Somalia strategy and operational framework on the prevention and response of child recruitment, release, and reintegration. The director general level of relevant ministries endorsed the strategy, but it awaited parliamentary approval at the close of the reporting period. Most Somalis lacked birth certificates, and in the absence of established birth registration systems or standardized methods for recruitment, verifying claims of child soldiering remained difficult. To increase transparency and accountability in the security sector and curb the recruitment and use of child soldiers in the SNA, during the previous reporting period the FGS undertook a process of biometric registration of SNA soldiers to validate their identities, force numbers, locales, electronic payment accounts, and registered weapons. It was unclear if the FGS carried out this biometric registration mechanism during this reporting period.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE
As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Somalia, and traffickers exploit victims from Somalia abroad. Information regarding trafficking trends and victims in Somalia remains challenging to obtain or authenticate. Traffickers most commonly use four cross-border routes, mirroring migration flows: a northern route to Europe via Libya; an eastern route to Europe via Turkey; a direct southern path to Kenya, Tanzania, or South Africa; and finally a path from south-central Somalia through Puntland onward to Yemen via the Bab el-Mandeb strait. In previous reporting periods in Somaliland, some women acted as recruiters and intermediaries who transported victims to Puntland, Djibouti, and Ethiopia for the purposes of forced labor in domestic service or sex trafficking. In prior years, the FGS noted that, anecdotally, fewer Somalis arrived in their intended destination countries but rather became stranded in transit countries. Anecdotal evidence purports al-Shabaab continues to facilitate human trafficking crimes, using deception, infiltration of madrassas and mosques, coercion or harassment of clan elders or family members, school raids, and abductions to recruit and subsequently force victims—including children and hailing most heavily from south-central Somalia and Kenya—into sexual slavery, military support roles, direct combat, and marriages to al-Shabaab militants. In 2018, al-Shabaab reportedly conducted numerous “handing-over” ceremonies in the presence of village and clan elders, during which the terrorists forced communities to “volunteer” hundreds of their children to fight among its ranks. Al-Shabaab continued to enslave an indeterminate number of young girls and exploited them in forced marriage and sexual servitude during the reporting period.

IDPs, certain marginalized ethnic minorities, people residing in al-Shabaab territory, and youth remain the most vulnerable to sex trafficking and forced labor. During the reporting period, authorities alleged the age of vulnerable migrants appeared to be much lower than previous years, to include children as young as 15. Somali youth working in the informal sector are at high risk of trafficking as they often are driven by familial or economic pressure to seek employment opportunities abroad. These economic migrants sometimes incur debts under the trafficking scheme dubbed “go now, pay later” or through economic exploitation. According to an international organization, traffickers extort payments from the respective families left behind or exert threats if they refuse or are unable to pay. In general, the predominant factors that compel migrants to leave Somalia are poverty, insecurity, and natural disasters. An international organization reported that, as of March 2019, it registered more than 800,000 refugees and 2.6 million IDPs from Somalia. Some Somalis willingly surrender custody of their children to people with whom they share familial ties and clan linkages and who may subsequently exploit some of these children in forced labor or sex trafficking. While many children work within their own households or family businesses, some traffickers may force children into labor in agriculture, domestic work, herding livestock, selling or portering khat, crushing stones, or in the construction industry. Although there is a lack of reliable statistics, Somaliland and Puntland continued to receive an influx of economic migrants and refugees from war-torn Yemen and the Oromia region of Ethiopia, in addition to returnees primarily from Yemen and Saudi Arabia.

Most trafficking networks continue to be organized by a combination of Somali, Djiboutian, Eritrean, and North African traffickers. Typically, traffickers employ deception as the predominant recruitment method, although al-Shabaab often uses coercion and force. An increasing number of traffickers recruit individuals through social media platforms and travel agencies, with a growing level of network sophistication. Traffickers also target and recruit children, without their parents’ awareness or support, using false promises that no payment will be demanded until they reach their targeted destinations. Traffickers and smugglers reportedly take advantage of the vulnerability of IDP women and children, mostly from southern and central Somalia, at times using false promises of lucrative jobs in Europe and North America. Traffickers transport Somali women, sometimes via Djibouti, to the Middle East, where they frequently endure forced labor, including in domestic service, or sex trafficking. Traffickers subject Somali men to conditions of forced labor in farming and construction in the Gulf States. Traffickers transport children to Saudi Arabia and Djibouti and force them to beg on the streets. Dubious employment agencies facilitate human trafficking by targeting individuals desiring to migrate to the Gulf States or Europe for employment.

SPECIAL CASE: YEMEN

Yemen remains a Special Case for the fifth consecutive year. The civil conflict and humanitarian crisis in Yemen continued during the reporting period. Information on human trafficking in the country has been increasingly difficult to obtain since March 2015, after which much of the Republic of Yemen government (ROYG) took refuge in Riyadh following the takeover of Sana’a by Iranian-backed Houthi rebels and stopped controlling significant portions of the country. NGOs reported vulnerable populations in Yemen were at an increased risk of human trafficking due to large-scale violence driven by protracted armed conflict, civil unrest and lawlessness, and worsening economic conditions. Migrant workers from the Horn of Africa who remained or arrived in Yemen during the reporting period may have endured intensified violence, and women and children may have become vulnerable to trafficking. The international organizations and NGOs remaining in Yemen focused primarily on providing humanitarian assistance to the local population and lacked adequate resources and capacity to gather reliable data on trafficking. A vast majority of Yemenis required broad assistance and basic social services, which have collapsed. For the purposes of this report, Yemen retained Special Case status.

GOVERNMENT EFFORTS

Due to the protracted conflict and tenuous political situation, the government faced serious challenges to combat trafficking, including substantial internal security threats, weak institutions, systemic corruption, economic deprivation, food insecurity, social disintegration, limited territorial control, and poor law enforcement capabilities. The government made some discernible anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts, and senior ROYG officials have repeated their commitment to fighting trafficking. The absence of a law criminalizing all forms of trafficking and the government’s conflation of trafficking and smuggling hindered government efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking offenders. Article 248 of the penal code criminalized slavery and prescribed penalties of up to 10 years’ imprisonment; these penalties were sufficiently stringent and, with respect to sex trafficking, commensurate with the penalties prescribed for other grave crimes, such as rape. However, Article 248 narrowly focused on transactions and movement and therefore did not criminalize many forms of labor and sex trafficking, as defined under international law. Article 279 criminalized child sex trafficking under its prostitution provision and prescribed penalties of up to seven years’ imprisonment, which could be increased to up to 15 years’ imprisonment under aggravating circumstances; these penalties were sufficiently stringent and commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. In 2014, the government adopted a bill that it subsequently referred to the Parliament, which aimed to combat all forms of trafficking, protect and assist victims, generate societal awareness of the risks of trafficking in order to reduce the phenomenon, and promote national cooperation. While the Parliament convened for two days during the current reporting period for the first time since the beginning of the conflict, it did not take up the trafficking bill.

The Government of the Republic of Yemen did not have full oversight of the courts and therefore did not report efforts to prosecute, convict, or punish trafficking offenses during the year. In addition, the government was unable to pursue any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government officials complicit in trafficking offenses, despite reports of officials allegedly engaged in trafficking, including the recruitment and use of child soldiers by the Republic of Yemen Government’s Armed Forces. However, it did make efforts during the reporting period through training to raise awareness of trafficking in the judicial and law enforcement sectors. Specifically, the Ministry of Human Rights, with support from an international organization, implemented a training in Ma’rib Governorate on the risks of child recruitment for 20 officers from the National Army and other security units in June 2019. In May 2019, a ROYG-sponsored workshop on child soldiering issues effectively reached 40 participants from different military regions across Yemen; it highlighted international charters and agreements to protect children in armed conflict. In addition, during the reporting year the government participated in a seminar that trained 25 public prosecutors, attorneys, and civil society organizations on trafficking crimes. Finally, in coordination with an international organization, 25 relevant officials from the courts, prosecutorial, legal affairs, and security departments, as well as from the police, and civil society engaged in a workshop on human trafficking to develop capacity.

The government did not have the access or capacity to identify and provide adequate protection services to trafficking victims among vulnerable groups, such as women in commercial sex and migrant laborers, some of whom were in transit to the Gulf States. To mitigate its inability to ensure trafficking victims were not inappropriately incarcerated, fined, or otherwise penalized for unlawful acts traffickers compelled them to commit, such as prostitution or immigration violations, the government did initiate new measures to protect migrants during the reporting period. The Office of the Prime Minister in May 2019 created a committee led by the Ministry of Interior’s Immigration, Passport and Naturalization Authority to assure the security and protection of the legal and human rights of this vulnerable migrant population. The government also used diplomatic channels and public statements to urge regional countries to fight organized human trafficking to curb the influx of migrants into Yemen. Although formal standard operating procedures for proactive identification of trafficking victims existed, efforts to implement or train law enforcement on these procedures were suspended due to the prolonged unrest. Furthermore, because of the fragile state of the government-in-exile, it was not able to encourage victims to assist in investigations or prosecutions of their traffickers and was financially unable to provide assistance to its nationals repatriated after enduring trafficking abroad. During the reporting period, both government-aligned forces and militia forces continued to unlawfully recruit and use some child soldiers; however, the government took some action in criticizing or condemning the active and aggressive rebel recruitment of child soldiers, including public press statements, and expressed its commitment to properly address this crime. In January 2020, the government entered into an agreement through the UN on a roadmap for implementation of the existing action plan to prevent the recruitment and use of child soldiers.

Due to its broad lack of access and capacity limitations, the government did not make sufficient efforts to prevent trafficking during the reporting period. The government established the National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking pursuant to Executive Order No.46 of 2012; its members included governmental and non-governmental interlocutors. A draft national strategy to combat trafficking initiated by the Ministry of Human Rights in a previous reporting period, in coordination with an international organization, remained pending. The draft included plans for raising awareness, increasing cooperation between Yemen and neighboring countries, training officials in victim identification, and instituting procedures to protect victims. The government did not provide anti-trafficking training to its diplomatic personnel and did not make efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts.

Since the escalation of armed conflict in March 2015, human rights organizations reported all parties to the conflict continued their unlawful recruitment and use of child soldiers. However, verification of such cases remained challenging during the reporting period due to intensified security threats against the monitors and communities of interest, in addition to more restrictive humanitarian access. As a result of its limited capacity and the ongoing conflict, the ROYG did not implement a 2014 UN action plan to end the recruitment and use of child soldiers, although it continued to express interest in revitalizing the discussion on implementation, and credible reports indicated the protraction of unlawful recruitment of children throughout the country during the reporting period. Due to the expansion of military activity by government and Houthi forces, tribal and coalition militias, and al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula during the year, the recruitment, training, and mobilization of children as participants in the conflict by non-governmental forces and allegedly—but unverified—by affiliated governmental forces continued. An international organization reported armed groups used boys mostly in combatant roles or to guard checkpoints and forced other children to carry out support duties such as cooking, washing clothes, and amassed intelligence during the reporting period. These trends are largely due to endemic customs and cultural norms in which tribal leaders arm children to participate in local militias that may support the government, back the Houthis movement, act as an anti-Houthi force, or be part of an unaligned tribal, local, or regional group that protects the respective village from rival tribes or other outsiders. During the reporting period, verified cases of the unlawful recruitment and use of child soldiers occurred with some familial knowledge or consent and monetary and material support utilized as incentives for joining the army; to a lesser extent, forced enrollment via abductions also occurred. Recruitment continued to target schools across Yemen. According to a human rights activist, in the governorate of Dhamar alone, the Houthis recruited dozens of teenagers to the frontlines during the reporting period. According to the 2019 UN Panel of Experts (POE) report, all parties to the conflict have used child soldiers under 18, including some under 15. The POE reported that of the 3,034 children recruited throughout the war, the Houthis were responsible for 64 percent of child recruitment. According to an international organization, between April and December 2019, armed groups unlawfully recruited and used at least 23 children between the ages of 10-17, compared to 96 and 370 children the previous two reporting periods, respectively. This trend of decline was reportedly due to limited access of monitors as a result of persistent security threats forcing critical partners to scale down humanitarian activities in conflict-laden areas. This impacted the documentation and verification of incidents during the reporting period. The incidents were reportedly attributed to Houthis and affiliated factions, Yemeni Armed Forces, and non-state actors outside Yemen’s command and control, including the Shabwani Elite Forces, Popular Committees and the Security Belt Forces. As in years past, in 2019, Yemeni officials did not report demobilizing any child soldiers. Yemen’s security, political, and economic crises, cultural acceptance of child soldiering, weak law enforcement mechanisms, and nascent but hampered political will continued to severely encumber the country’s capacity to end the recruitment and use of child soldiers.

TRAFFICKING PROFILE

As reported over the past five years, human traffickers exploit domestic and foreign victims in Yemen, and traffickers exploit victims from Yemen who reside abroad. The ongoing conflict, lack of rule of law, economic degradation, pervasive corruption, and fractional territorial control have disrupted some trafficking patterns and exacerbated others. Prior to the conflict, Yemen was a transit point and destination for women and children, primarily from the Horn of Africa, who were exploited in sex trafficking and forced labor. International organizations reported—despite the perilous Gulf of Aden boat crossing—an estimated 138,000 migrants entered Yemen via Djibouti in 2019, many of whom were vulnerable to trafficking, thereby underscoring the need for proactive screening of potential victims among migrants. Ethiopians and Somalis traveled voluntarily to Yemen with the hope of employment in Arabian Gulf countries; traffickers exploited some of these migrants in forced labor and sex trafficking in transit countries, reportedly most often in Yemen. Prior to the conflict’s escalation and the government’s departure in March 2015, Saudi Arabia allegedly deported Yemeni migrant workers and returned them to Yemen through the al-Tuwal and al-Buq border crossings. Most deportees reportedly returned to the impoverished Tihamah region located on the west coast of Yemen. Many in this group remained displaced and highly vulnerable to exploitation, including trafficking. During the reporting period, the country’s civil war continued to generate a substantial flow of persons fleeing outward from Yemen to Djibouti and to their respective home countries. An international organization reported assisting more than 3,750 migrants to return to Ethiopia and approximately 1,680 migrants to return to Somalia. Since the escalation of armed conflict in March 2015, human rights organizations reported all parties to the conflict continued their unlawful recruitment and use of child soldiers. However, verification of such cases remained challenging during the reporting period due to intensified security threats against the monitors and communities of interest, in addition to more restrictive humanitarian access. Civil society organizations and media outlets assessed in the previous reporting period that trafficking of Yemeni children gradually increased since the civil war commenced, and children were disproportionately affected by its protracted escalation.
An Indonesian man pulls out his fishing net. Unscrupulous recruitment agencies, worker-paid fees, and isolated locations often place workers in the fishing industry at risk of forced labor in East Asia.
RELEVANT INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS

The chart below shows the Ratification, Accession (a), or Acceptance (A) of relevant international conventions for those countries that have ratified, acceded to, or accepted any such conventions between April 2019 and March 2020. A complete list that includes all of the countries covered by the 2020 Trafficking in Persons Report is available at: https://www.state.gov/international-conventions-relevant-to-combating-trafficking-in-persons/.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Brunei Darussalam</td>
<td>2020</td>
<td>2006</td>
<td>2016</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>2008</td>
<td>—</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eritrea</td>
<td>2014</td>
<td>2005</td>
<td>2005</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>2019 (will enter into force 03 June 2020)</td>
<td>—</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palau</td>
<td>2019</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>2019</td>
<td>—</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tuvalu</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>2019 (will enter into force on 11 June 2020)</td>
<td>—</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
STOPPING HUMAN TRAFFICKING AND SEXUAL EXPLOITATION AND ABUSE BY INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPERS AND CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

As required by law, this section summarizes actions taken by the UN, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and the OSCE to prevent trafficking in persons or the exploitation of victims of trafficking.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>UN</th>
<th>OSCE</th>
<th>NATO</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>TOTAL NUMBER OF PEACEKEEPING AND SUPPORT PERSONNEL</td>
<td>95,423 (including 5,284 women)</td>
<td>3,603</td>
<td>20,967</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TOTAL NUMBER OF MISSIONS</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>16</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LEAD OFFICE RESPONSIBLE FOR IMPLEMENTATION</td>
<td>Department of Management Strategy, Policy and Compliance</td>
<td>Office of Human Resources, Special Representative and Coordinator for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings</td>
<td>NATO Human Security Unit</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PREVENTION TRAINING</td>
<td>Pre-deployment and at mission, including a new e-learning program</td>
<td>Pre-deployment</td>
<td>Pre-deployment and at mission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NUMBER OF ALLEGATIONS IN 2019</td>
<td>80 allegations were made against 106 military, police, and civilian personnel. The majority of the allegations were in the Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of Congo, South Sudan, and Mali. The allegations affected 92 victims, of which 19 were children younger than 18 years of age.</td>
<td>No reported allegations</td>
<td>No reported allegations – NATO relies on contributing countries to report allegations.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NEW INITIATIVES</td>
<td>The Secretary General established a Civil Society Advisory Board on prevention of SEA in February 2019 to advise him on strengthening UN engagement with civil society organizations. 50 heads of UN entities submitted to the Secretary General action plans on measures undertaken to prevent and respond to SEA. Senior leadership must annually certify that all allegations that have come to their attention are reported and that mandatory training has been delivered.</td>
<td>The OSCE is providing workshops and training to participating States on financial investigations into trafficking, using technology to combat trafficking, preventing trafficking in organizations’ supply chains, and identifying trafficking victims.</td>
<td>NATO Sexual Exploitation and Abuse Action Plan to be adopted by October 2020. NATO Human Trafficking Policy (2004) to be updated in 2021.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ORGANIZATIONS AND SELECTED LINKS OF INTEREST</td>
<td>FRAMEWORK DOCUMENT RELEVANT TO TIP</td>
<td>TIP FOCAL POINT</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---------------------------------------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------</td>
<td>----------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>www.unodc.org</td>
<td>UNSC Resolutions:</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UNODC Global Report on Trafficking in Persons</td>
<td>UNODC Evidential Issues in Trafficking in Persons Cases: Case Digest</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>United Nations Office of the High Commissioner on Human Rights</td>
<td>Sharing Electronic Resources and Laws on Crime (SHERLOC):</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ILO</td>
<td>UN Sustainable Development Goal targets 5.2, 8.7, and 16.2 (SDGs):</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>-P029 Protocol of 2014 and Recommendation R203, supplementing the Forced Labour Convention (1930)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>-C105 Abolition of Forced Labour Convention (1957)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>-C189 Domestic Workers Convention, and its Recommendation R201 (2011)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>African Union (AU)</td>
<td>Ouagadougou Action Plan to Combat Trafficking in Human Beings, Especially Women and Children (2006)</td>
<td>N/A</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>AU Commission Initiative against Trafficking Campaign (AU.COMMIT)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ORGANIZATIONS AND SELECTED LINKS OF INTEREST</td>
<td>FRAMEWORK DOCUMENT RELEVANT TO TIP</td>
<td>TIP FOCAL POINT</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------</td>
<td>----------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) www.cis.minsk.by/ (in Russian only)</td>
<td>Agreement on the Cooperation of the CIS Member States in Combating Trafficking in Persons, Human Organs and Tissues (2005) Program of Cooperation between the CIS Member States against Trafficking in Persons for 2014–2018</td>
<td>N/A</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ORGANIZATIONS AND SELECTED LINKS OF INTEREST</td>
<td>FRAMEWORK DOCUMENT RELEVANT TO TIP</td>
<td>TIP FOCAL POINT</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------</td>
<td>----------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
| Coordinated Mekong Ministerial Initiative against Trafficking (COMMIT)
COMMIT 3rd Sub-Regional Plan of Action (COMMIT SPAIII, 2011-2013)
12th COMMIT Senior Officials Meeting (2017)
Victim Identification and Referral Mechanisms:
Common Guidelines for the Greater Mekong Sub-region:
Supporting the Reintegration of Trafficked Persons:
A Guidebook for the Greater Mekong Sub-Region:
http://un-act.org/publication/supporting-reintegration-trafficked-persons-guidebook-greater-mekong-sub-region/ | Special Representative and Coordinator for Trafficking in Human Beings |
| Council of the Baltic Sea States (CBSS)
http://www.cbss.org/civil-security-the-human-dimension/tfthb/
www.childcentre.info/egcc/ | A Vision for the Baltic Sea region by 2020, CBSS Summit 2010
Human Trafficking 2016 – Baltic Sea Round-up Report
Expert Group on Children at Risk
Task Force Against Trafficking in Human Beings |
| Council of Europe (COE)
www.coe.int
HELP Online Training Course: https://www.coe.int/en/web/anti-human-trafficking/help-online-training-course
HUDOC-GRETA Database: https://hudoc.greta.coe.int/eng | GRETA |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>ORGANIZATIONS AND SELECTED LINKS OF INTEREST</th>
<th>FRAMEWORK DOCUMENT RELEVANT TO TIP</th>
<th>TIP FOCAL POINT</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| ECOWAS
www.ecowas.int
Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS) | ECOWAS Initial Plan of Action against Trafficking in Persons (2002-2003), extended until 2011
Joint ECOWAS/ECCAS Regional Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children (2006-2008)
ECOWAS Strategic Framework For Strengthening National Child Protection Systems To Prevent And Respond To Violence, Abuse And Exploitation Against Children In West Africa (2017)
Strategic Plan Of Action For The ECOWAS Child Policy 2019 – 2030 | Anti-Trafficking Unit |
| EU
EU Anti-Trafficking Action 2017-2019:
| Financial Action Task Force (FATF)
https://www.fatf-gafi.org/media/fatf/content/images/Human-Trafficking-2018.pdf | |
| League of Arab States (LAS)
Arab Initiative to Combat Trafficking in Persons; 2010
Comprehensive Arab Strategy for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings (CASCTHB), Council of Arab Ministers of Justice Resolution 15/2/2012 | N/A |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Organization of American States (OAS)</th>
<th>Work Plan to Combat Trafficking in Persons in the Western Hemisphere 2010-2012 (AG/RES. 2551 XL-O/10)</th>
<th>Department of Public Security and Department against Transnational Organized Crime</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Hemispheric Efforts against Trafficking in Persons “Declaration of Mexico” (2018)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Progress Report: II Work Plan Against Trafficking in Persons In The Western Hemisphere 2015-2018</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ORGANIZATIONS AND SELECTED LINKS OF INTEREST</td>
<td>FRAMEWORK DOCUMENT RELEVANT TO TIP</td>
<td>TIP FOCAL POINT</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------</td>
<td>----------------</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
SECTIONS 405(c) AND (d) OF THE CHILD SOLDIERS PREVENTION ACT (CSPA) OF 2008 (22 U.S.C. 2370c-2(c) AND (d))

This report is submitted in accordance with sections 405(c) and (d) of the Child Soldiers Prevention Act of 2008 (22 U.S.C. 2370c-2(c) and (d)). Section 1 lists the countries identified as being in violation of the standards under the CSPA in 2019. Section 2 provides a description and the amounts of assistance withheld pursuant to section 404(a) of the CSPA. Section 3 provides a list of waivers or exceptions exercised under the CSPA. Section 4 contains the justifications for such waivers. Section 5 provides a description and the amounts of assistance provided to countries pursuant to such waivers.

The Secretary of State identified the following countries as having governmental armed forces, police, or other security forces or government-supported armed groups that recruited or used child soldiers within the meaning of section 404(a) of the CSPA during the reporting period of April 1, 2018, to March 31, 2019: Afghanistan, Burma, Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), Iran, Iraq, Mali, Somalia, South Sudan, Sudan, Syria, and Yemen.

SECTION 2. DESCRIPTION AND AMOUNT OF ASSISTANCE WITHHELD PURSUANT TO SECTION 404(a).

No security assistance subject to section 404(a) of the CSPA was planned to be provided to Burma, Iran, Sudan, or Syria in fiscal year (FY) 2020.

SECTION 3. LIST OF WAIVERS OR EXCEPTIONS EXERCISED UNDER SECTION 404(a).

On October 18, 2019, the President determined it is in the national interest of the United States to waive the application of the prohibition in section 404(a) of the CSPA with respect to Afghanistan and Iraq; to waive the application of the prohibition in section 404(a) of the CSPA with respect to the DRC to allow for the provision of International Military Education and Training (IMET) and Peacekeeping Operations (PKO) assistance, to the extent that the CSPA would restrict such assistance or support; to waive the application of the prohibition in section 404(a) of the CSPA with respect to Mali to allow for the provision of IMET and PKO assistance and the issuance of licenses for direct commercial sales of military equipment and DoD support provided pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 333, to the extent that the CSPA would restrict such assistance or support; to waive the application of the prohibition in section 404(a) of the CSPA with respect to Somalia to allow for the provision of IMET and PKO assistance and DoD support provided pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 333, to the extent that the CSPA would restrict such assistance or support; to waive the application of the prohibition in section 404(a) of the CSPA with respect to South Sudan to allow for the provision of PKO assistance, to the extent that the CSPA would restrict such assistance or support; and to waive the application of the prohibition in section 404(a) of the CSPA with respect to Yemen to allow for the provision of PKO assistance and DoD support provided pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 333, to the extent that the CSPA would restrict such assistance or support. The President further certified that the governments of the above countries are taking effective and continuing steps to address the problems of child soldiers.

SECTION 4. JUSTIFICATIONS FOR WAIVERS AND EXCEPTIONS.

A copy of the Memorandum of Justification provided to Congress with the waiver determination is available online at the TIP Office’s website.

SECTION 5. DESCRIPTION AND AMOUNT OF ASSISTANCE PROVIDED PURSUANT TO A WAIVER.

The information provided below only includes assistance obligated as of April 15, 2020. Additional assistance will be obligated during FY 2020.

Afghanistan

International Military Education and Training (IMET)  $209,000
As of April 15, IMET funding was obligated for the following activity: military professionalization training.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Peacekeeping Operations $20,000
As of April 15, PKO funding was obligated for the following activities: oversight, assessment, and travel.

Iraq

International Military Education and Training $107,000
As of April 15, IMET funding was obligated for the following activities: military professionalization training.

Mali

International Military Education and Training $413,000
As of April 15, IMET funding was obligated for the following activities: military professionalization training.

Peacekeeping Operations $240,000
As of April 15, PKO funding was obligated for the following activities: logistical support for counterterrorism operations, counter-improvised explosive device training, and military intelligence equipment.

10 U.S.C. 333 $4,700,000
As of April 15, 333 funding was obligated for the following activities: advisory support, training, and equipment.

Somalia

Peacekeeping Operations $7,233,000
As of April 15, PKO funding was obligated for Somali National Army for the following activities: logistical support, advisory support, training, and equipment.

10 U.S.C. 333 $4,022,000
During FY 2020, 333 funding was obligated for the following activities: training and equipment.
GLOSSARY OF ABBREVIATIONS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Full Form</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ASEAN</td>
<td>Association of Southeast Asian Nations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ECOWAS</td>
<td>Economic Community of West African States</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ELN</td>
<td>National Liberation Army</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EU</td>
<td>European Union</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EUROPOL</td>
<td>European Police Office</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FARC</td>
<td>Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GRETA</td>
<td>Council of Europe's Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IDP</td>
<td>Internally displaced person</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ILO</td>
<td>International Labour Organization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INTERPOL</td>
<td>International Criminal Police Organization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IOM</td>
<td>International Organization for Migration</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ISIS</td>
<td>Islamic State of Iraq and Syria</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LGBTI</td>
<td>Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Intersex</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NGO</td>
<td>Nongovernmental organization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OSCE</td>
<td>Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UN</td>
<td>United Nations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UNHCR</td>
<td>United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UNICEF</td>
<td>United Nations Children's Fund</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UNODC</td>
<td>United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

NOTES: Local currencies have been converted to U.S. dollars ($) using the currency exchange rates reported by the U.S. Department of the Treasury on December 31, 2019. The rates can be found here: https://www.fiscal.treasury.gov/files/reports-statements/treasury-reporting-rates-exchange/ratesofexchangeasofdecember312019.pdf
THE STAFF OF THE OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS IS:

Eric Abdullateef
Karen Vierling Allen
Julia F. Anderson
Andrea Balint
Shonnie R. Ball
Kyle M. Ballard
MacKenzie Bills
Michelle Cooper Bloom
Kelsey Brennan
Christine Buchholz
Ravi Buck
Carla M. Bury
Mark Carlson
Erin Chapman
Anisha Choubey
Anna Cornacchio
Steven Davis
Lamiaa Elfar
Mary C. Ellison
Daniel Evensen
Heather Fisher
Mark Forstrom
Rachel Fox Smothermon
Anna Fraser
Lucia Gallegos
Timothy Gehring
Patrick Hamilton
Tegan Hare
Jocelyn Harrison
Amy Rustan Haslett
Abbey Hecht
Caitlin B. Heidenreich
Sonia Helmy-Dentzel
Greg Hermsmeyer
Julie Hicks
Megan Hjelle-Lantsman
Jennifer M. Ho
Bethany Hanke Hoang
Ariana Holly
Renee Huffman
Veronica Jablonski
Harold Jahnson
Sarah Jennings
Maurice W. Johnson
Kari A. Johnstone
Catherine E. Kay
Nayab Khan
Emily A. Korenak
Kendra L. Kreider
Tenzing Lahdon
Renee Laviere
Marcus Littman
Abigail Long
Jason Martin
Myrtis Martin
Sunny Massa
Monica Maurer
Joel Maybury
Kerry McBride
Rendi McCoy
Maura K. McManus
Ericka Moten
Ryan Mulvenna
Samantha Novick
Amy O’Neill Richard
Leo Page-Blau
Sandy Perez Rousseau
Andrew Pfender
Reimi Pieters
Marissa Pietrobono
Justin D. Pollard
Alexis Ramdass
John Cotton Richmond
Laura Svat Rundlet
Chad C. Salitan
Haley L. Sands
Sarah A. Scott
Adrienne Sgarlato
Mai Shiozaki-Lynch
Julie Short Echalar
Jane Nady Sigmon
Soumya Silver
Ann Karl Slusarz
Susan Snyder
Whitney Stewart
Desirée Suo Weymont
Francesca J. Tadle
Atsuki Takahashi
James Taylor
Chaiszar Turner
Kathy Unlu
Melissa Verlaque
Kathleen Vogel
Myrna E. Walch
Bianca Washington
Tatum West
Shelly Westebbe
Andrea E. Wilson
Ben Wiselogle
Kaitlyn Woods
Joshua Youle
Yasmine Zavala
Janet Zinn

Special thanks to Derek Adams, Lamya Shawki El-Shacke, and the creative services team at Global Publishing Solutions.
EXHIBIT 2
BURMA 2019 HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Burma has a quasi-parliamentary system of government in which the national parliament selects the president and constitutional provisions grant one-quarter of parliamentary seats to active-duty military appointees. The military also has the authority to appoint the ministers of defense, home affairs, and border affairs and one of two vice presidents, as well as to assume power over all branches of the government should the president declare a national state of emergency. In 2015 the country held nationwide parliamentary elections that the public widely accepted as a credible reflection of the will of the people. The National League for Democracy (NLD) party leader Aung San Suu Kyi was the civilian government’s de facto leader and, due to constitutional provisions preventing her from becoming president, remained in the position of state counsellor.

The Myanmar Police Force (MPF), under the Ministry of Home Affairs (led by an active-duty general), is responsible for internal security. The Border Guard Police is administratively part of the MPF but operationally distinct. The armed forces under the Ministry of Defense are responsible for external security but are also engaged extensively in internal security, including combat against ethnic armed groups. Under the constitution civilian authorities have no authority over the security forces; the armed forces commander in chief, Senior General Min Aung Hlaing, maintained effective control over the security forces.

Extreme repression of and discrimination against the minority Rohingya population, who are predominantly Muslim, continued in Rakhine State. Intense fighting between the military and the ethnic-Rakhine Arakan Army (AA) that escalated in January displaced thousands more civilians, further disrupted humanitarian access to vulnerable populations, and resulted in serious abuses of civilian populations. Fighting between the military and ethnic armed groups in northern Shan State, as well as fighting there among ethnic armed groups, temporarily displaced thousands of persons and resulted in abuses, including reports of civilian deaths and forced recruitment by the ethnic armed groups.

Significant human rights issues included: reports of extrajudicial and arbitrary killings by security forces; enforced disappearance by security forces; torture and rape and other forms of sexual violence by security forces; arbitrary detention by the government; harsh and sometimes life-threatening prison conditions; political prisoners; arbitrary or unlawful interference with privacy; significant problems with the independence of the judiciary; severe restrictions on free expression including arbitrary arrest and prosecution of journalists, and criminal libel laws; substantial interference with the rights of peaceful assembly and freedom of association, including arrests of peaceful protesters and restrictions on civil society activity; severe restrictions on religious freedom; significant restrictions on freedom of movement, in particular for Rohingya; significant acts of corruption by some officials; some unlawful recruitment and use of child soldiers; trafficking in persons; crimes involving violence or threats targeting members of national, ethnic, and religious minorities; laws criminalizing consensual same-sex sexual conduct between adults, although those laws were rarely enforced; and the use of forced and child labor.

There continued to be almost complete impunity for past and continuing abuses by the military. In a few cases the government took limited actions to prosecute or punish officials responsible for abuses, although in ways that were not commensurate with the seriousness of the crime.

Some armed ethnic groups committed human rights abuses, including killings, unlawful use of child soldiers, forced labor of adults and children, and failure to protect civilians in conflict zones. These abuses rarely resulted in investigations or prosecutions.

Section 1. Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Arbitrary Deprivation of Life and Other Unlawful or Politically Motivated Killings

There were many reports security forces committed arbitrary or unlawful killings (see also section 1.g.).

Security forces used excessive and sometimes lethal force against civilians. On May 2, soldiers shot and killed eight of 200 villagers detained for suspected ties to the AA in northern Rakhine State’s Rathedaung Township.

There were reports of suspects in custody dying as a result of police mistreatment. On June 2, Tun Myint Win was arrested by police for allegedly participating in a protest against the building of a cement factory. He was sent to Oboe Prison in Mandalay and died on June 5; his family attributed his death to police abuse during his detention. On June 13, Tun Myint Win’s mother was also charged with protesting, and as of November her case continued. Through October, 15 persons died in military detention in Rakhine State.

The trial of four individuals charged in the death of Ko Ni, a prominent Muslim lawyer and adviser to Aung San Suu Kyi who was assassinated outside Rangoon’s international airport in 2017, concluded on February 15 with the conviction of four men. As of October the ostensible organizer was yet to be found. Civil society groups and religious groups noted Ko Ni’s death had a chilling effect on lawyers working for constitutional reform and accountability for military abuses, as well as on Muslims fighting for improved treatment.

On May 6, seven soldiers convicted of the murder of 10 Rohingya men and boys in Inn Dinn during the 2017 military crackdown were released after serving less than a year of their 10-year prison sentence.

Arbitrary and unlawful killings related to internal conflict also occurred (see section 1.g.).

b. Disappearance

There were reports of disappearances by security forces.

Amnesty International documented the military’s enforced disappearance of six men—one ethnic Mro and five ethnic Rakhine—in mid-February.

Disappearances related to internal conflict also occurred (see section 1.g.).

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The law prohibits torture; however, members of security forces reportedly tortured and otherwise abused prisoners, detainees, and other citizens and stateless persons in incidents not related to armed conflict. Such incidents occurred, for example, in Rakhine. Authorities generally took no action to investigate incidents or punish alleged perpetrators.

The government did not launch any investigation into reports of sexual violence by the military from this or prior years.
Two soldiers raped and tortured an ethnic Ta’ang woman on May 10 in Namhsan Township, Shan State. On March 18, approximately 150 soldiers entered a village near Mrauk U in Rakhine State and rounded up young men hiding in the monastery with other villagers. The men were separated out, stripped naked, and forced to do jumping exercises and were beaten, while being asked about the AA.

Security forces reportedly subjected detainees to harsh interrogation techniques designed to intimidate and disorient, including severe beatings and deprivation of food, water, and sleep. Human rights groups reported incidents of torture by security forces and some ethnic armed groups in ethnic minority areas.

From August 8 to 21, a young man accused of being an AA member was held incommunicado and subjected to electric shocks by soldiers, forcing him to confess to having ties with the AA, according to the United Nations.

Prison and Detention Center Conditions

There were continued reports that conditions in prisons, labor camps, and military detention facilities were harsh and sometimes life threatening due to overcrowding, degrading treatment, and inadequate access to medical care and basic needs, including food, shelter, and hygiene. Observers noted some minor improvement in more centrally located prisons.

The Ministry of Home Affairs Department of Corrections operates the prison and labor camp system and continued to significantly restrict access by international organizations--other than the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC)--to prison and detention facilities generally.

The military did not permit access to its detention facilities.

Physical Conditions: There were an estimated 47 prisons and 48 labor camps, the latter referred to by the government as “agriculture and livestock breeding career training centers” and “manufacturing centers.” More than 20,000 inmates were serving their sentences in these labor camps across the country. Authorities reportedly sent prisoners whose sentences did not include “hard labor” to labor camps in contravention of the law and rented out prisoners as labor to private companies. In spite of reforms in recent years, conditions at the camps remained life threatening for some, especially at 18 camps where prisoners worked as miners.
A prominent human rights group estimated there were approximately 100,000 prisoners. Women and men were held separately. Overcrowding was reportedly a serious problem in many prisons and labor camps; a human rights group reported that occupancy at the country’s largest prison was more than double capacity. Some prisons held pretrial detainees together with convicted prisoners. Authorities held some political prisoners separately from common criminals, but political prisoners arrested in land rights disputes were generally held together with common criminals.

Bedding was often inadequate and sometimes consisted of a single mat, wooden platform, or laminated plastic sheet on a concrete floor. Prisoners did not always have access to potable water. In many cases family members had to supplement prisoners’ official rations, medicine, and basic necessities. Inmates reportedly paid wardens for necessities, including clean water, prison uniforms, plates, cups, and utensils.

Medical care was inadequate and reportedly contributed to deaths in custody. Prisoners suffered from health problems, including malaria, heart disease, high blood pressure, tuberculosis, skin diseases, and stomach problems, caused or exacerbated by unhygienic conditions and spoiled food. Former prisoners also complained of poorly maintained physical structures that provided no protection from the elements and had rodent, snake, and mold infestation.

Prison conditions in Rakhine State were reportedly among the worst, with hundreds of Rohingya and ethnic-Rakhine subjected to torture and abuse by state prison and security officials.

Administration: Some prisons prevented full adherence to religious codes for prisoners, ostensibly due to space restrictions and security concerns. For example, imprisoned monks reported authorities denied them permission to observe Buddhist holy days, wear robes, shave their heads, or eat on a schedule compatible with the monastic code. Some authorities continued to cite security considerations to deny permission for Muslim prisoners to pray together as a group, as is the practice for Friday prayers and during Ramadan.

Prisoners and detainees could sometimes submit complaints to judicial authorities without censorship or negative repercussions.

Independent Monitoring: The ICRC had conditional access to all prisons and labor camps; it did not have access to military detention sites. With prior approval from the Prison Department, it could visit all prison and labor camps twice monthly but could not meet privately with prisoners. The ICRC reported its findings through a strictly confidential bilateral dialogue with prison authorities. These reports were neither public nor shared with any other party.

Improvements: The UN Office on Drugs and Crime ran a program aimed at strengthening prison health systems. It included implementing the Standard Operating Procedures on Healthcare in Prisons, launched in 2018, to provide training to medical staff working on drug treatment and mental health assistance. The program continued to provide comprehensive support to prisons in Rangoon, Mandalay, Myitkyina, and Lashio.

d. Arbitrary Arrest or Detention

The law does not prohibit arbitrary arrest, and the government continued to arrest persons, often from ethnic and religious minorities, and notably in Rakhine State, on an arbitrary basis.

Amnesty International documented seven cases of arbitrary arrest in Rakhine State in the first half of the year. The arrests were exclusively of men, usually ethnic Rakhine men of fighting age, and were often accompanied by torture and other mistreatment aimed at obtaining information about the AA.

The law allows the government to extend sentences after prisoners complete their original sentence. The Minister of Home Affairs may extend a prison sentence unilaterally by two months on six separate occasions, for a total extension of one year.

The law allows authorities to order detention without charge or trial of anyone they believe is performing or might perform any act that endangers the sovereignty and security of the state or public peace and tranquility. The civilian government and the military continued to interpret these laws broadly and used them arbitrarily to detain activists, student leaders, farmers, journalists, political staff, and human rights defenders.

Legal mechanisms exist to investigate abuses by security forces but were seldom used and generally perceived to be ineffective.

Arrest Procedures and Treatment of Detainees
Personnel from the Office of the Chief of Military Security Affairs and police commonly conducted searches and made arrests at will, despite the law generally requiring warrants.

By law authorities may hold suspects in pretrial detention for two weeks (with a possible two-week extension) before bringing them before a judge or informing them of the charges against them. Lawyers noted police regularly detained suspects for the legally mandated period, failed to file a charge, then detained them for a series of two-week periods with trips to the judge in between.

The law does grant detainees the right to consult an attorney, but in some cases authorities refused to allow suspects to meet with a lawyer. In May 2018 the government amended the law to provide access to fair and equal legal aid based on international standards and to ensure legal aid workers could operate independently and with legal protection. Through October the legal aid program handled 132 cases, mostly in Shan and Mon States.

There is a functioning bail system, but bribery was a common substitute for bail. Bail is commonly offered in criminal cases, but defendants were often required to attend numerous pretrial hearings before bail was granted. In some cases the government held detainees incommunicado. There were reports of authorities not informing family members of the arrests of persons in a timely manner, not telling them of their whereabouts, and often denying them the right to see prisoners in a timely manner.

Arbitrary Arrest: There were reports of arbitrary arrests, including detention by the military in conflict areas. Amnesty International further documented seven cases of arbitrary arrest in Rakhine State in the first half of year. These arrests were exclusively of men, usually ethnic Rakhine men of fighting age, and were often accompanied by torture and other mistreatment aimed at obtaining information about the AA.

Pretrial Detention: Judges and police sometimes colluded to extend detentions. According to lawyers, arbitrary and lengthy pretrial detentions resulted from lengthy legal procedures, large numbers of detainees, judicial inefficiency, widespread corruption, and staff shortages. Periods of detention prior to and during trials sometimes equaled or exceeded the sentence that would result from a guilty conviction.
Detainee’s Ability to Challenge Lawfulness before a Court: Security forces often arrested and detained individuals without following proper procedures, in violation of national law. Arbitrary arrest or detention was sometimes used to suppress political dissent.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The law calls for an independent judiciary, although the government manipulated the courts for political ends and sometimes deprived citizens of due process and the right to a fair trial, particularly in freedom of expression cases.

The criminal justice system was overburdened by a high number of cases lodged against small-time drug users, who constituted an estimated 50 percent of caseloads in the courts. Corruption remained a significant problem. According to civil society organizations, officials at all levels received illegal payments at all stages of the legal process for purposes ranging from influencing routine matters, such as access to a detainee in police custody, to substantive decisions, such as fixing the outcome of a case.

The military and the government directly and indirectly exerted influence over the outcome of cases, often through overly broad or arbitrary application of legislation on speech or association. On September 20, a former army captain, U Nay Myo Zin, was sentenced to one year in prison for his critical public remarks in April about the military leadership and in support of constitutional reform.

Trial Procedures

The law provides for the right to a fair and public trial, but also grants broad exceptions, effectively allowing the government to violate these rights at will. In ordinary criminal cases, the government allowed courts to operate independently, and courts generally respected some basic due process rights such as allowing a defense and appeal. In practice defendants do not enjoy a presumption of innocence or the rights to be informed promptly and in detail of the charges against them; to be present at their trial; to free interpretation; or, except in capital cases, to consult an attorney of their choice or have one provided at government expense. There is no right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defense; defense attorneys in criminal cases generally had 15 days to prepare for trial. In May 2018 the Union Attorney General’s Office adopted a fair trial standards manual, but because of the low standard of legal education, prosecutors, defense attorneys, and judges were often unfamiliar with precedent, case law, and basic legal procedures.
While no legal provision allows for coerced testimony or confessions of defendants to be used in court, authorities have reportedly engaged in both practices. There were reports of official coercion to plead guilty despite a lack of evidence, with promises of reduced sentences to defendants who did so. There were reports of coercion to plead guilty despite a lack of evidence with promises of reduced sentences to defendants who did so.

Although the law provides that ordinary criminal cases should be open to the public, in practice members of the public with no direct involvement in a case were denied entry to courts. There is no right to confront witnesses and present evidence, although defense attorneys could sometimes call witnesses and conduct cross-examinations. Prodemocracy activists generally were able to retain counsel, but other defendants’ access to counsel was inadequate.

Local civil society groups noted the public was largely unaware of its legal rights, and there were too few lawyers to meet public needs.

Political Prisoners and Detainees

The government continued to detain and arrest journalists, activists, and critics of the government and the military. According to civil society groups that use a definition of political prisoners that includes those who may have engaged in acts of violence and excludes some charges related to freedom of expression and religion, there were 50 convicted political prisoners as of October. Another 580 individuals were facing trial for their political views, of whom 179 were detained and the rest were out on bail, according to the Assistance Association for Political Prisoners.

On March 19, Aye Maung, chairman of the Arakan National Party, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for high treason and another two years for defamation of the state. He was arrested and charged in January 2018 after his public remarks at the commemoration of the 233rd anniversary of the fall of the Arakan Kingdom--remarks that allegedly expressed and encouraged support for the rebel AA.

Aung Ko Htway, jailed in March 2018 for defaming the military following an interview he gave to an international media outlet on his experiences as a former child soldier, was released in September.

Many former political prisoners experienced significant surveillance and restrictions following their release, including the inability to resume studies.
undertaken prior to incarceration, secure travel documents, or obtain other documents related to identity or ownership of land.

Civil Judicial Procedures and Remedies

No specific mechanisms or laws provide for civil remedies for human rights violations; however, complainants may use provisions of the penal code and laws of civil procedure to seek civil remedies. Individuals and organizations may not appeal an adverse decision to regional human rights bodies.

Property Restitution

Under the constitution the state owns all land, although the law allows for registration and sale of private land ownership rights. Authorities and private-sector organizations seized land during the year; restitution was very limited, despite the law. In Shan State communities were further concerned by the expansion of private-sector investment for coal mining on the seized land. Protests in September stopped studies for a copper mine in Sagaing Region.

The law provides for compensation when the government acquires land for a public purpose; however, civil society groups criticized the lack of safeguards in the law and said that compensation was infrequent and inadequate in such cases. The government can also declare land unused and assign it to foreign investors or designate it for other uses.

There is no judicial review of land ownership or confiscation decisions; administrative bodies subject to political control by the national government make final decisions on land use and registration. Researchers and civil society groups said land laws facilitate land confiscation without providing adequate procedural protections. In some cases advance notice of confiscations was not given.

In 2018 land-law amendments undercut provisions that favored recognition of traditional land-tenure systems. In late 2018 the Ministry of Agriculture announced that small holders had six months to register their land or risk becoming trespassers on their own land. If rigorously enforced, this order could result in millions of persons losing rights of access to their lands. Awareness of the amendments remained low in affected communities.

Police arrested farmers during the year for violating the land-use law. In September a court in Ayeyarwaddy Region sentenced eight farmers, who claimed to be the original and uncompensated owners of land seized as vacant and transferred to a private company, to two years in prison for farming the land. During the year many other farmers were awaiting trial in similar cases.

Civil society groups raised concerns that the vacant-land law posed a particularly serious threat to traditional collective land ownership patterns prevalent in areas inhabited by ethnic minority groups. Ethnic and civil society groups staged protests during the year in Kachin and Karen States, Mandalay Region, and elsewhere over the government’s land policies.

Observers were concerned that the law could also be used to prevent displaced Rohingya from returning to their land or receiving adequate compensation. Officials stated that burned land would revert to the government and posted signs in several instances to that effect. Moreover, following the military campaign in Rakhine State, authorities bulldozed villages, demolished structures, and cleared vegetation to build security bases and other structures. Because of this and because the land law also requires that land not used productively within four years revert to the government, civil society groups saw little progress in returning land confiscated by the government.

The General Administration Department under the Ministry of the Office of the Union Government oversees land return. Adequate compensation was not provided to the many farmers and rural communities whose land was confiscated without due process during the former military regime, including by the Myanmar Oil and Gas Enterprise, the Myanmar Ports Authority, and the military itself.

f. Arbitrary or Unlawful Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The law protects the privacy and security of the home and property, but these protections were poorly enforced. The law does not protect the privacy of correspondence or other communications, and activists reported authorities routinely conducted surveillance of civil society organizations’ operations.

Some activists reported the government systematically monitored citizens’ travel and closely monitored the activities of politically active persons, while others reported they did not experience any such invasions of privacy. Special Branch police, official intelligence networks, and other administrative systems (see section 2.d.) were reported agents of such surveillance.
The law restricts the ability of Buddhist women to marry non-Buddhist men by imposing a requirement of public notification prior to any such marriage and allowing for objections to the marriage to be raised in court, although the law was rarely enforced.

In Rakhine State, local authorities prohibited Rohingya families from having more than two children, although this was inconsistently enforced. Authorities there also required Rohingya to obtain a permit to marry officially, a step not required of other ethnicities. Waiting times for the permit could exceed one year, and bribes usually were required. Unauthorized marriages could result in prosecution of Rohingya men under the penal code, which prohibits a man from “deceitfully” marrying a woman, and could result in a prison sentence or fine.

There were reports of regular, unannounced nighttime household checks in northern Rakhine State and in other areas.

g. Abuses in Internal Conflict

There were long-running armed internal conflicts across the country. Reports of killings, disappearances, beatings, torture, forced labor, forced relocations, the use of child soldiers, excessive use of force, disregard for civilian life, sexual violence, and other abuses committed by government forces and armed opposition and rebel groups were common. Within the military, impunity for abuses and crimes generally continued, although the military took disciplinary action in some cases.

In December 2018 the military declared a four-month unilateral ceasefire covering Kachin and Shan States; it was extended to September 21. The ceasefire was partly responsible for a reduction in violence in Kachin State, although fighting, including military violations of the cease-fire, continued in northern Shan State and there was a significant upturn in violence in August. Conflict continued in central and northern Rakhine State between the military and the Rakhine-ethnic AA.

Fighting in Kachin continued throughout the year, resulting in civilian casualties, credible reports of military abuses of civilians, and the displacement of large numbers of people; fighting also affected the Paletwa Township in southern Chin State. In Shan State, clashes continued between and among various groups and the military, with credible allegations of abuse of civilian populations by both the military and ethnic armed groups. In most of the southeast, pervasive and organized violent abuse of civilian populations in ethnic minority areas declined, largely due to a number of bilateral cease-fire agreements reached with ethnic armed groups.

Killings: Military officials reportedly killed, tortured, and otherwise seriously abused civilians in conflict areas without public inquiry or accountability. Following ethnic armed groups’ attacks on the military, the military reportedly often directed its attacks against civilians, resulting in civilian deaths. Some ethnic armed groups, most notably the Ta’ang National Liberation Army (TNLA), allegedly killed civilians suspected of being members of rival armed groups. The AA allegedly killed civilians suspected of providing information to the military.

On September 10, two decapitated male bodies were found in the middle of a market in Kan Htaung Gyi town in Rakhine State’s Myebon Township. The incident brought to 13 the number of unsolved murders of civilians in northern Rakhine State during the year. The military and the AA accused each other of being responsible.

On August 15, the TNLA, likely with some support from allied ethnic armed groups, attacked military and police bases, killing 13 security personnel. The military and TNLA were responsible for artillery and other fire that resulted in the deaths of civilians, including five civilians (three of them children) killed on August 31 during fighting near Kutkai. Each side blamed the other for the civilian deaths.

In September the military announced its court of inquiry would begin court-martial proceedings against an unspecified number of soldiers for “weakness in following instructions” in connection with 2017 clashes with the Arakan Rohingya Salvation Army in Gu Dar Pyin, Rakhine State. A military spokesperson stated the court martial concerned violations of the military’s rules of engagement and was not connected to press reports of a mass grave of Rohingya men in Gu Dar Pyin.

Abductions: Government soldiers and nonstate armed groups abducted villagers in conflict areas. There were credible reports that the military abducted individuals in Rakhine State in March and kept them incommunicado. In February the AA abducted civilians from Paletwa, Chin State, and took them into Bangladesh; they returned the civilians months later to their homes. On September 23, government soldiers in Shan State reportedly arrested 14 civilians, including four girls, and forced them to join their patrol, with one civilian ordered to march in front of the column formation.
Physical Abuse, Punishment, and Torture: Nongovernmental organization (NGO) reports provided credible information that the military engaged in torture and beating of civilians alleged to be working with or perceived to be sympathetic to ethnic armed groups in Rakhine State. There were also continued reports of forced labor and forced recruitment by the United Wa State Army (UWSA), the Restoration Council of Shan State, and the TNLA.

Reports continued that the military forced civilians to carry supplies or serve in other support roles in conflict areas such as northern Shan, southern Chin and Rakhine States.

The United Nations, media, and NGOs during the year documented the widespread use of rape and sexual violence by the military in Rakhine, Kachin, and Shan States since at least 2011.

Civilians, armed actors, and NGOs operating inside the country and along the border reported continued landmine use by the military and armed groups.

Child Soldiers: The military and four armed groups--the Kachin Independence Army, the armed wing of the Kachin Independence Organization; the Karen National Liberation Army, the armed wing of the Karen National Union; the TNLA; and the UWSA--were listed in the UN secretary-general’s 2019 report on Children and Armed Conflict as perpetrators of the recruitment and use of children.

The penalties imposed for recruiting and using child soldiers were not commensurate with the seriousness of these crimes. In past years most of these cases reportedly culminated in reprimands, demotions, relocations, fines, or decreases in pensions, penalties significantly less than those prescribed by criminal law. Despite military directives prohibiting the use of children, some children were still recruited. There were reports middlemen helped bypass age verification procedures to allow the enrollment of underage recruits, sometimes at the request of the recruits’ families. The Ministry of Defense undertook to investigate military personnel implicated in recruiting child soldiers. There was, however, no evidence that the government prosecuted soldiers in civilian courts for recruitment or use of child soldiers.

The military generally allowed UN monitors to inspect for compliance with agreed-upon procedures for ending the recruitment of children and identifying and demobilizing those serving in armed conflict. There were, however, some delays in securing official permissions, and access to conflict areas was generally denied.
The government continued to prevent ethnic armed groups from signing joint plans of action with the United Nations to end the recruitment of child soldiers and to demobilize and rehabilitate those already serving.

Also see the Department of State’s * Trafficking in Persons Report* at https://www.state.gov/trafficking-in-persons-report/.

Other Conflict-related Abuse: The government restricted the passage of relief supplies and access by international humanitarian organizations to conflict-affected areas of Rakhine, Kachin, and Shan States. The government regularly denied access to the United Nations, international NGOs, and diplomatic missions, asserting the military could not ensure their security or by claiming that humanitarian assistance would benefit ethnic armed group forces. In some cases the military allowed gradual access as government forces regained control over contested areas.

As of October there were an estimated 40,000 internally displaced persons (IDPs) in areas of the country outside government control, primarily in northern Kachin State. Fighting in Rakhine and Shan States displaced tens of thousands of persons during the year, compounding the long-term displacement of conflict-affected communities in these areas. Most of those newly displaced in Shan State, however, were able to return home during the year. Locally based organizations had some access to IDPs in areas outside government control, but the military increased restrictions on their access, including through threats of prosecution. The military has largely restricted access to IDPs and Rohingya in general in the conflict-affected areas of Rakhine State to only the Red Cross and the World Food Program, resulting in unmet humanitarian needs among these IDPs. The government has not granted the United Nations or other international organizations humanitarian access to areas in Kachin State outside of military control since June 2016.

More than 107,000 persons remained displaced by conflict in Kachin and Shan States. In some cases villagers driven from their homes fled into the forest, frequently in heavily mined areas, without adequate food, security, or basic medical care (see section 2.d.).

Section 2. Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Expression, Including for the Press
The constitution provides that “every citizen shall be at liberty in the exercise of expressing and publishing freely their convictions and opinions,” but it contains the broad and ambiguous caveat that exercise of these rights must “not be contrary to the laws enacted for national security, prevalence of law and order, community peace and tranquility, or public order and morality.” Threats against and arrests of journalists continued during the year.

Freedom of Expression: Freedom of expression was more restricted than in 2018. Authorities arrested, detained, convicted, intimidated, and imprisoned citizens for expressing political opinions critical of the government and the military, generally under charges of defamation, incitement, protesting without a permit, or violating national security laws. This included the detentions and trials of activists and ordinary citizens. The government applied laws carrying more severe punishments than in the past, including laws enabling years-long prison sentences.

The criminal defamation clause under the telecommunications law was frequently used to restrict freedom of expression. Several critics of the government and the military faced charges under this law. On August 29, for example, noted filmmaker and human rights activist Min Htin Ko Ko Gyi was sentenced to one year in prison for Facebook posts that were critical of the military’s role in politics; he also faced other potential charges.

Five members of the Peacock Generation performance troupe were detained without bail for a satirical performance during the April New Year holiday criticizing the military’s role in politics. On October 30, five members were found guilty of defaming the military and were sentenced to one year of labor. As of November the case for other charges continued.

Military officers brought or sought to bring charges against several prominent religious figures based on their criticism of the military, including multiple Buddhist monks and the prominent Kachin Baptist reverend, Hkalam Samson. Authorities dropped the complaint against Samson, but the cases against at least two prominent, protolerance monks critical of the military and Bamar Buddhist ultranationalism, Sein Ti Ta and Myawaddy Sayadaw, remained open as of November.

A variety of laws were used to censor or prosecute public dissent. On June 19 and 21, the military used a privacy law to press charges against 12 individuals, including reporters, for allegedly aiding and abetting trespass on seized land in Kayah State. As of November the case continued.
Some persons remained wary of speaking openly about politically sensitive topics due to monitoring and harassment by security services and ultranationalist Buddhist groups. Police continued to monitor politicians, journalists, writers, and diplomats.

Press and Media, Including Online Media: Independent media were active and able to operate, despite many official and unofficial restrictions. The government continued to permit the publication of privately owned daily newspapers. As of July authorities approved 46 dailies; however, press freedom declined compared with 2018, and the security forces detained journalists under laws carrying more severe sentences than those it used in previous years.

Local media could cover human rights and political issues, including, for example, democratic reform and international investigations of the 2017 ethnic cleansing in Rakhine State, although they observed some self-censorship on these subjects. Official action or threats of such action increased against journalists reporting on conflict in Rakhine State involving the AA. The government generally permitted media outlets to cover protests and civil conflict, topics not reported widely in state-run media.

The military continued to practice zero tolerance of perceived critical media commentary through prosecution by civil authorities. Members of the ruling party increasingly prosecuted journalists perceived as critical.

In May the president granted amnesty to two Reuters reporters detained in late 2017 and sentenced in 2018 to seven years in prison under the Official Secrets Act for their investigation of security forces’ activities in northern Rakhine State.

On September 30, a court ruled a defamation case could again be heard against Myanmar Now editor in chief Swe Win. Charges were dismissed on July 2 after the plaintiff, Wirathu, repeatedly failed to appear in court; as of November the case continued. Swe Win was arrested in 2017 for allegedly sharing a Facebook post suggesting the monk Wirathu, a prominent Ma Ba Tha (a local Buddhist organization) figurehead, violated the monastic code of conduct by making statements commending the 2017 assassination of well known Muslim constitutional lawyer Ko Ni (see section 1.a.).

The government relaxation of its monopoly and control of domestic television broadcasting continued, with five private companies broadcasting using Ministry of Information platforms. Many media outlets reported the cost of applying for and maintaining a television channel was prohibitive. The government offered three public channels--two controlled by the Ministry of Information and one by the military; the ministry channels regularly aired the military’s content. Two private companies that had strong links to the previous military regime continued to broadcast six free-to-air channels. The government allowed the general population to register satellite television receivers for a fee, but the cost was prohibitive for most persons outside of urban areas. The military, government, and government-linked businesspersons controlled the eight privately or quasi-governmentally owned FM radio stations.

Violence and Harassment: Nationalist groups continued to target journalists who criticized government policy on intercommunal and Rakhine State issues. Businesspersons engaged in illegal enterprises, sometimes together with local authorities, also harassed and threatened journalists reporting on their activities, including with the threat of legal action. Officials continued to monitor journalists in various parts of the country.

Censorship or Content Restrictions: Although generally not enforced, laws prohibit citizens from electronically passing information about the country to foreign media, exposing journalists who reported for or cooperated with international media to potential harassment, intimidation, and arrest. There were no reports of overt prepublication censorship, and the government allowed open discussion of some sensitive political and economic topics, but incidents of legal action against publications that criticized the military or the government heightened concern among local journalists and increased self-censorship.

Self-censorship was common, particularly on issues related to Buddhist extremism, the military, the situation in Rakhine State, and the peace process. Journalists reported that such self-censorship became more pronounced after the 2018 trial and conviction of two Reuters journalists. The government ordered media outlets to use certain terms and themes to describe the situation in northern Rakhine State and threatened penalties against journalists who did not follow the government’s guidance, which exacerbated already high levels of self-censorship on this topic. Authorities prevented journalists’ access to northern Rakhine State except on government-organized trips that participants reported to be tightly controlled and designed to advance the government’s narrative. The government continued to use visa issuance and shortened visa validities to control foreign journalists, especially those not based in the country.
The government censorship board reviews all films to be screened inside the country. On June 15, the screening of a film critical of the military was abruptly pulled from the opening night of the Human Rights Human Dignity International Film Festival. The founder of the festival, Min Htin Ko Ko Gyi, was in jail at the time and was later convicted of criticizing the military (see section 2.a.).

Journalists continued to complain about the widespread practice of government informants attending press conferences and other events, which they said intimidated reporters and the events’ hosts. Informants demanded lists of hosts and attendees.

Libel/Slander Laws: Military and civilian government officials used broad defamation statutes to bring criminal charges against journalists, activists, and ordinary citizens.

In February a Dawei Township court fined the editor of the Thanintharyi Journal 500,000 kyat ($330) over the journal’s 2017 publication of a satirical article about a regional official. On August 26, six Karenni youths were charged with slander for calling the Kayah State chief minister a traitor over his support for the erection of a statue to Aung San Suu Kyi’s father. On November 7, they were sentenced to six months in prison with labor.

In September a local NLD office in Ayeyarwaddy Region brought charges against a cartoonist for allegedly defaming the township and the NLD. On September 19, an NLD official in Mandalay sued two Facebook users, alleging their satiric memes defamed the regional chief minister.

Internet Freedom

The government did not generally censor online content. The government did, however, restrict access to the internet. On June 20, the Ministry of Transport and Communications ordered mobile phone operators to stop mobile internet traffic in eight townships in northern Rakhine State and in Paletwa Township in southern Chin State due to “disturbances of peace and use of internet services to coordinate illegal activities.” The ban was lifted on August 31 in five of the nine affected townships but remained in effect in four townships in northern Rakhine State as of November.

The Telecommunications Law includes broad provisions giving the government the power to temporarily block and filter content, on grounds of “benefit of the people.” According to Freedom House, pressure on users to remove content continued to originate from the government, military, and other groups. The law does not include provisions to force the removal of content or provide for intermediary liability, although some articles are vague and could be argued to cover content removal. Pressure to remove content instead came from the use or threat of use of other criminal provisions.

The government’s Social Media Monitoring Team reportedly continued to monitor internet communications without clear legal authority and used defamation charges to intimidate and detain some individuals using social media to criticize the military, government officials, or the ruling party. There were also instances of authorities intimidating online media outlets and internet users. Social media continued to be a popular forum to exchange ideas and opinions without direct government censorship, although there were military-affiliated disinformation campaigns on social media.

Academic Freedom and Cultural Events

Government restrictions on academic freedom and cultural events continued.

The government tightened restrictions on political activity and freedom of association on university campuses. On February 13, seven students of Yadanabon University in Mandalay were found guilty of arson and of holding a December 2018 protest without providing proper notification. The students were sentenced to a total of three months’ in prison with hard labor. The seven students were prominent members of the Yadanabon Student Union and were involved in organizing a series of protests beginning on December 28 on Yadanabon University campus, calling for improved campus security. During the protest dozens of students burned a mock coffin containing photos of the university rector, the chief minister of Mandalay Region, the regional minister for electricity, road, and transportation, and the minister for security and border affairs.

The government generally allowed the informal establishment of student unions, although among university rectors and faculty there was considerable fear and suspicion of student unions. Although some student unions were allowed to open unofficial offices, the All Burma Federation of Student Unions, as in previous years, was unable to register but participated in some activities through informal networks.
There were reported incidents of the government restricting cultural events. There is a ban on street art.

b. Freedoms of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The constitution provides for the freedoms of peaceful assembly and association, but the government restricted these rights.

Freedom of Peaceful Assembly

Although the constitution provides the right to peaceful assembly, it was not always respected in practice. Authorities used laws against criminal trespass as well as provisions which criminalize actions the government deemed likely to cause “an offense against the State or against the public tranquility” to restrict peaceful assembly.

Restrictions remained in place in 11 Rangoon townships on all applications for processions or assemblies. Some civil society groups asserted these restrictions were selectively applied and used to prevent demonstrations against the government or military. Farmers and social activists continued to protest land rights’ violations and land confiscation throughout the country, and human rights groups reported the arrest of farmers and supporters. Many reported cases involved land seized by the former military regime and given to private companies or persons with ties to the military.

Whether civil society organizations were required to apply for advance permission before holding meetings and other functions in hotels and other public venues varied by situation and by government official. Some officials forced venues to cancel civil society events where such permission was not obtained; others required civil society organizations to request advance permission from the local government to meet with diplomats.

Following a peaceful protest in February against the erection of a statue of the Burmese independence hero (and father of Aung San Suu Kyi) General Aung San in Loikaw, Kayah State, the local government arrested 55 demonstrators, with charges of defamation and illegal protest which were later dropped after negotiations between activists and the local government.

On October 2, the chairwoman of the Karen Women’s Union, Naw Ohn Hla, and two other activists were convicted and sentenced to 15 days in prison for holding an unauthorized Karen Martyr’s Day celebration in Rangoon in August. They had sought approval from authorities before the commemoration, but it was not granted because of the use of the term “martyr,” a term the government tended to associate exclusively with Aung San and the members of his cabinet who were assassinated alongside him.

Freedom of Association

Although the constitution and laws allow citizens to form associations and organizations, the government sometimes restricted this right.

In July the State Sangha Maha Nayaka Committee (a government-appointed body of high-ranking Buddhist monks) again declared Ma Ba Tha an “illegal organization.” The State Sangha Maha Nayaka Committee had banned Ma Ba Tha from using that name in 2017. Some local branches of the organization continued to use the name on their signs in spite of the ban, and as of October no action had been taken against them.

The law on registering organizations stipulates voluntary registration for local NGOs and removes punishments for noncompliance for both local and international NGOs. Some NGOs that tried to register under this law found the process extremely onerous.

Activists reported that civil society groups, community-based organizations, and informal networks operated openly and continued to discuss human rights and other political problems openly. They reported, however, that state surveillance of such operations and discussions was common and that government restrictions on meetings and other activity continued during the year.

c. Freedom of Religion

See the Department of State’s International Religious Freedom Report at https://www.state.gov/religiousfreedomreport/.

d. Freedom of Movement

The law does not protect freedom of internal movement, foreign travel, emigration, or repatriation. Local regulations limit the rights of citizens to settle and reside anywhere in the country. By law the president may require the registration of foreigners’ movements and authorize officials to require foreigners to register every change of address exceeding 24 hours.

The government appeared to restrict informally repatriation by maintaining an opaque “black list” of individuals, including some from the exile community, who were prohibited from entering the country.

In-country Movement: Regional and local orders, directives, and instructions restrict freedom of movement.

Restrictions on in-country movement of Rohingya were extensive. Authorities required the largely stateless Rohingya to carry special documents and travel permits for internal movement in areas in Rakhine State where most Rohingya reside. Township officers in Buthidaung and Maungdaw Townships continued to require Rohingya to submit a “form for informing absence from habitual residence” for permission to stay overnight in another village and to register on the guest list with the village administrator. Obtaining these forms and permits often involved extortion and bribes.

Restrictions governing the travel of foreigners, Rohingya, and others between townships in Rakhine State varied, depending on township, and generally required submission of a document known as “Form 4.” A traveler could obtain this form only from the township Immigration and National Registration Department (INRD) and only if that person provided an original copy of a family list, a temporary registration card, and letters from two guarantors. Travel authorized under Form 4 is generally valid for two to four weeks, but it is given almost exclusively for medical emergencies, effectively eliminating many opportunities to work or study. The cost to obtain the form varied from township to township, with required payments to village administrators or to the township INRD office ranging from the official amount of 30,000 to more than two million kyats ($20 to $1,320). Extensive administrative measures are imposed on Rohingya and foreigners in Rakhine State, which effectively prevented persons from changing residency.

There were credible reports of hundreds of Rohingya serving prison terms of up to two years for attempting to travel out of Rakhine State without prior authorization. In October authorities convicted 30 Rohingya for attempting to travel from Rakhine State to Rangoon without travel permits. The court sentenced 21 of them to two years in prison and sent eight children to a detention center. The youngest, age five, was being held in a Pathein prison with his mother as of November. In January seven Rohingya, including a child, from Kyauktaw Township in Rakhine State were sentenced to two years’ detention for travelling without valid documents after walking 300 miles to western Bago Region.

Foreign Travel: The government maintained restrictions to prevent foreign travel by political activists, former political prisoners, and some local staff of foreign embassies, although such persons reported encountering far fewer delays and restrictions. Stateless persons, particularly Rohingya, were unable to obtain documentation necessary for foreign travel.

e. Internally Displaced Persons

As of October an estimated 263,000 individuals were living as IDPs due to violence in Kachin, Rakhine, and northern Shan states. Some 101,000 Rohingya IDPs have been displaced since 2012. The UN Office of Coordination for Humanitarian Affairs estimated that more than 28,000 of the primarily Rohingya IDPs in Rakhine State have been displaced by armed conflict since January and that more than 8,000 persons were displaced in northern Shan State at the height of the violence there in August, although most of these later returned home. Approximately 128,000 Rohingya remained confined to IDP camps in Rakhine State following 2012 intercommunal violence; a small number of Kaman and Rakhine have also lived in IDP camps since 2012. An additional estimated 7,000 Rohingya remained internally displaced following atrocities beginning in 2017 in northern Rakhine State along with a small number of individuals from other ethnic groups. Accurate figures were difficult to determine due to continued poor access to affected areas.

In addition to internal displacement provoked by conflict, a March report by the UN special rapporteur on human rights in Burma highlighted displacement (as well as the loss of livelihood) caused by natural resource extraction and environmental destruction in Kachin, Shan, and Kayin States. The special rapporteur noted increased human rights abuses associated with militarization around resource extraction sites prevented IDPs from returning home.

The United Nations and other humanitarian agencies reported significant deterioration in humanitarian access during the year, and the military blocked access to IDPs and other vulnerable populations in areas controlled by nonstate armed groups (see section 1.g., Other Conflict-related Abuse). Access to displaced persons in or near conflict zones continued to be a challenge, with the military restricting access by humanitarian actors seeking to provide aid to affected communities.

The government restricted the ability of IDPs and stateless persons to move, limiting access to health services and schooling. While a person’s freedom of movement generally derived from possession of identification documents, authorities also considered race, ethnicity, religion, and place of origin as factors in enforcing these regulations. Residents of ethnic-minority states reported the government restricted the travel of IDPs and stateless persons.

Some 101,000 Rohingya IDPs lived in Sittwe’s rural camps, where they relied on assistance from aid agencies. Humanitarian agencies provided access to clean water, food, shelter, and sanitation in most IDP camps for Rohingya.

f. Protection of Refugees

Abuse of Migrants, Refugees, and Stateless Persons: The government did not always cooperate with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) or other humanitarian organizations in providing protection and assistance to IDPs, refugees, returning refugees, asylum seekers, and other persons of concern. For example, the government routinely refused to allow humanitarian organizations access to Rakhine State and other locations.

Access to Asylum: The law does not provide for granting asylum or refugee status, and the government has not established a system for providing protection to refugees. UNHCR did not register any asylum seekers during the year.

g. Stateless Persons

The vast majority of Rohingya are stateless. Following the forced displacement of more than 700,000 Rohingya to Bangladesh in 2017, up to 600,000 Rohingya were estimated to remain in Rakhine State. There were also likely significant numbers of stateless persons and persons with undetermined nationality throughout the country, including persons of Chinese, Indian, and Nepali descent. Although these latter groups did not face the same level of official and social discrimination as Rohingya, they were still subject to the lesser rights and greater restrictions of associate and naturalized citizenship.

The government recognizes 135 “national ethnic groups” whose members are automatically full citizens. The law also establishes two forms of citizenship short of full citizenship: associate and naturalized. Citizens of these two types are unable to run for political office; form a political party; serve in the military, police, or public administration; inherit land or money; or pursue certain professional degrees, such as medicine and law. Only members of the third generation of associate or naturalized citizens are able to acquire full citizenship.

The law defines “national ethnic group” only as a racial and ethnic group that can prove origins in the country dating back to 1823, the year prior to British colonization. In practice the government has granted or withdrawn “national ethnic group” status from ethnic groups throughout the country on various occasions. Because the Rohingya are not on the list, and due to other government action, they are stateless. Several ethnic minority groups, including the Chin and Kachin, criticized the classification system as inaccurate.

Some Rohingya are technically eligible for full citizenship. The process involves additional official scrutiny and in practice requires substantial bribes to government officials, and even then it does not provide for the rights guaranteed to other full citizens. Members of other ethnic groups faced similar challenges.

The law does not provide protection for children born in the country who do not have a “relevant link” to another state.

The government continued to call for Rohingya to apply for National Verification Cards (NVC), created in 2015. The government claims that these cards are necessary to apply for citizenship. NGO reports indicated that Rohingya were pressured or coerced to accept NVCs. For example, there were reported cases of government officials requiring Rohingya to have an NVC to go fishing or access a bank account. Many Rohingya expressed the need for more assurances about the results of the process. Many said they were already citizens and expressed fear the government would either not affirm their citizenship or would provide a form of lesser citizenship, thereby formalizing their lack of rights. Some townships in Rakhine State required Rohingya to identify as “Bengali” to apply for NVCs.

Section 3. Freedom to Participate in the Political Process

The constitution provides citizens limited ability to choose their government through elections held by secret ballot; the electoral system is not fully representational and does not assure the free expression of the will of the people. Under the constitution, active-duty military are appointed to one-quarter of all national and regional parliamentary seats, and the military has the right to appoint the ministers of defense, home affairs--which has responsibility for police, prisons, and other domestic security matters--and border affairs. The military can also indefinitely assume power over all branches of the government should the president declare a national state of emergency. The constitution prohibits persons with immediate relatives holding foreign citizenship from becoming president. Amending the constitution requires approval by more than 75 percent of members of parliament, giving the military effective veto power over constitutional amendments.

Elections and Political Participation

Recent Elections: Observers considered the 2015 national election to be generally reflective of the will of the people, notwithstanding some structural shortcomings, and considered subsequent by-elections in 2017 and 2018 basically free and fair. Observers raised concerns that 25 percent of seats in parliament were reserved for unelected military officers; potential Muslim candidates were disqualified by their political parties on an apparently discriminatory basis; almost all members of the Rohingya community, many of whom voted in elections prior to 2015, were disenfranchised; and the government canceled voting in some conflict-affected ethnic minority areas. The NLD, chaired by Aung San Suu Kyi, won more than 77 percent of the contested 1,150 seats at the state, regional, and union levels in the 2015 election.

Political Parties and Political Participation: Opposition parties and civil society organizations continued to exercise their rights to assemble and protest. New political parties were generally allowed to register and compete in elections, which featured fewer restrictions on party organization and voter mobilization. Only sporadic interference from government officials was reported. Competition was skewed in part by the military-backed United Solidarity and Development Party’s systematic support from the military, whose personnel and their families are eligible to vote, casting ballots in military barracks in some cases. Moreover, some legal provisions can be invoked to restrict parties’ operations. The constitution contains a requirement that political parties be loyal to the state, which carries the potential for abuse. Laws allow for penalties, including deregistration, against political parties that accept support from foreign governments or religious bodies, or that are deemed to have abused religion for political purposes or disrespected the constitution.

Participation of Women and Minorities: No laws limit the participation of women and members of minorities in the political process, and they did participate.
Nevertheless, women and minorities continued to be underrepresented in government. Aung San Suu Kyi was the only woman in a national cabinet of 24 ministers. Women made up only about 13 percent of national and local elected legislators. Women were chief ministers of Kayin State and Tanintharyi Region, although the latter was dismissed in March following accusations of corruption.

As of October, five chief ministers of the seven ethnic states belonged to the largest ethnic groups of their states, including the chief minister of Rakhine State; one of two union-level vice presidents belonged to the Chin ethnic minority group and one belonged to the Mon ethnic group. Ethnic-minority parliamentarians from ethnic-minority political parties made up about 9 percent of legislators at the national, state, and regional level; this did not include the numerous ethnic-minority members of the NLD, or the Union Solidarity and Development Party.

As noncitizens in the view of the government, Rohingya were excluded from the political process. Most Rohingya-majority areas were represented by an ethnic Rakhine nationalist party. No Muslim candidate won in 2015, resulting in a national parliament that for the first time had no Muslim representatives.

Section 4. Corruption and Lack of Transparency in Government

The law provides criminal penalties for corruption by officials, and the government continued efforts to curb corruption.

Corruption: Corruption remained a problem, particularly in the judiciary. Police reportedly often required victims to pay substantial bribes for criminal investigations and routinely extorted money from the civilian population. The government took some steps to investigate and address corruption of government officials.

On September 9, the Anti-Corruption Commission charged Aung Zaw, general manager of the state-owned Burma Pharmaceutical Industry, with bribery for the improper purchasing of raw materials for the factory. As of November the case continued. On July 26, Industry Minister Khin Maung Cho was forced to resign for failing to open a tender process for the procurement of raw materials worth more than one billion kyats ($660,000) at the same factory.

Financial Disclosure: Public officials were not subject to public financial disclosure laws. The law requires the president and vice presidents to furnish a list of family assets to the speaker of the joint houses of parliament, and the law requires persons appointed by the president to furnish a list of personal assets to the president. The government did not make the reports available to the public.

Civil servants cannot accept gifts worth more than 25,000 kyats ($17). The rules also require civil servants to report all offers of gifts to their supervisors, whether or not they are accepted.

Section 5. Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Abuses of Human Rights

The government did not allow domestic human rights organizations to function independently. Human rights NGOs were able to open offices and operate, but there were reports of harassment and monitoring by authorities, and authorities sometimes pressured hotels and other venues not to host meetings by activists or other civil society groups.

Foreign human rights activists and advocates, including representatives from international NGOs, continued to be restricted to short-term visas that required them to leave the country periodically for renewal. The government continued to monitor the movements of foreigners and interrogated citizens concerning contacts with foreigners.

The United Nations or Other International Bodies: The government has not agreed to the opening of an Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) and has not approved visa requests for OHCHR staff.

In August a UN fact-finding mission, established by the UN Human Rights Council, published two reports on the country: one on sexual and gender-based violence and the gendered impact of ethnic conflicts and the other on the military’s economic interests and their relation to human rights abuses. The government rejected the mandate of the fact-finding mission and the content of its reports and denied the mission members permission to enter the country.

The government has also refused cooperate with or give the Independent Investigative Mechanism for Myanmar, created by the UN Human Rights Council, access to the country.

The government continued to refuse entry to the UN special rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Myanmar, but permitted the UN secretary-general’s special envoy on Myanmar, Christine Schraner-Burgener, to open an office in the country and to meet with senior officials, including Aung San Suu Kyi and Commander in Chief Min Aung Hlaing.

The ICRC had access to civilian prisons and labor camps. The government also allowed the ICRC to operate in ethnic-minority states, including in Shan, Rakhine, and Kachin States.

Government Human Rights Bodies: The Myanmar National Human Rights Commission investigated some incidents of human rights abuses. In some cases it called on the government to conduct investigations into abuses. Its ability to operate as a credible, independent mechanism remained limited. The commission supported the development of human rights education curricula, distributed human rights materials, and conducted human rights training.

The Independent Commission of Enquiry for Rakhine State, formed by the government in July 2018, continued its investigations but had not released any findings as of November. Previous government-led investigations into reports of widespread abuses by security services against the Rohingya in northern Rakhine State in 2016 yielded no findings of responsibility by security forces and were criticized by international observers as deeply flawed.

Section 6. Discrimination, Societal Abuses, and Trafficking in Persons

Women

Rape and Domestic Violence: Rape is illegal but remained a significant problem, and the government did not enforce the law effectively. Spousal rape is not a crime unless the wife is younger than 14. Police generally investigated reported cases of rape, but there were reports police investigations were not sensitive to victims. Civil society groups continued to report police in some cases verbally abused women who reported rape, and women could be sued for impugning the dignity of the perpetrator.

On July 6, an estimated 6,000 demonstrators protested the alleged sexual assault in May of a two-year-old girl at a nursery school in Nay Pyi Taw and over concerns about the transparency of the trial. Thousands of Facebook users changed their profile pictures to the silhouette of a girl to demand “Justice for Victoria,” the pseudonym of the victim. On July 9, the leader of the campaign was arrested for Facebook posts “defaming” the police officers investigating the case. Both cases continued as of November.
Domestic violence against women, including spousal abuse, remained a serious problem. Abuse within families was prevalent and considered socially acceptable. Spousal abuse or domestic violence was difficult to measure because the government did not maintain comprehensive statistics and victims typically did not report it, although the government attempted to document cases, and reported cases were on the rise. The law prohibits committing bodily harm against another person, but there are no laws specifically against domestic violence or spousal abuse unless the wife is younger than 14. Punishment for violating the law includes sentences ranging from one year to life in prison in addition to possible fines. Overlapping and at times contradictory legal provisions complicated implementation of these limited protections.

Sexual Harassment: The penal code prohibits sexual harassment and imposes a maximum of one year’s imprisonment and a fine for verbal harassment and a maximum of two years’ imprisonment and a fine for physical contact. There was no information on the prevalence of the problem because these crimes were largely unreported. Local civil society organizations reported police investigators were not sensitive to victims and rarely followed through with investigations or prosecutions.

Coercion in Population Control: There were no reports of coerced abortion or involuntary sterilization. A 2015 law, however, contains provisions that if enforced could impose coercive birth-spacing requirements. Under the law the president or the national government may designate “special regions” for health care following consideration of factors such as population, natural resources, birth rates, and food availability. Once a special region is declared, the government may create special health-care organizations to perform various tasks, including establishing regulations related to family-planning methods. The government has not designated any such special regions since the law’s enactment.

A two-child local order issued by the government of Rakhine State pertaining to the Rohingya population in two northern townships remained in effect, but the government and NGOs reported it was not consistently enforced (see section 1.f.).

Discrimination: By law women enjoy the same legal status and rights as men, including property and inheritance rights and religious and personal status, but it was not clear the government enforced the law. The law requires equal pay for equal work, but it was not clear the formal sector respected this requirement. NGOs reported some sectors, such as the garment industry, did not comply.
Poverty affected women disproportionately. The law governing hiring of civil service personnel states that nothing shall prevent the appointment of men to “positions that are suitable for men only,” with no further definition of what constitutes positions “suitable for men only.”

Customary law was widely used to address issues of marriage, property, and inheritance; it differs from the provisions of statutory law and was often discriminatory against women.

Children

Birth Registration: The law automatically confers full citizenship to children of two parents from one of the 135 recognized national ethnic groups and to children who met other citizenship requirements. Moreover, the government confers full citizenship to second-generation children of both parents with any citizenship, as long as at least one parent has full citizenship. Third-generation children of associate or naturalized citizens can acquire full citizenship.

A prominent international NGO noted significant rural-urban disparities in birth registration. In major cities (e.g., Rangoon and Mandalay), births were registered immediately because registration is required to qualify for basic public services and to obtain national identification cards. In smaller towns and villages, birth registration often was informal or nonexistent. For the Rohingya community, birth registration was a significant problem (see section 2.d.). The Advisory Commission on Rakhine State noted in its interim report that nearly one-half of all residents in Rakhine State lacked birth documentation.

A birth certificate provides important protections for children, particularly against child labor, early marriage, and recruitment into the armed forces and armed groups. Sometimes a lack of birth registration complicated access to public services in remote communities.

Education: By law, education is compulsory, free, and universal through the fourth grade (up to age 10). This leaves children ages 10 through 13 vulnerable to child labor, since they are not required to attend school but are not legally permitted to work, as the minimum age for work is 14. The government continued to allocate minimal resources to public education, and schools charged informal fees.

Schools were often unavailable in remote communities and access to them for internally displaced and stateless children also remained limited.
Child Abuse: Laws prohibit child abuse, but they were neither adequate nor enforced. NGOs reported corporal punishment was widely used against children. The punishment for child abuse is a maximum of two years’ imprisonment or a maximum fine of 10,000 kyats ($6.60). There was anecdotal evidence of violence against children occurring within families, in schools, in situations of child labor and exploitation, and in armed conflict. The Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief, and Resettlement continued its child protection programs in partnership with UNICEF to improve data collection, develop effective laws, provide psychosocial assistance, and combat trafficking. Violence in Rakhine, Shan, and Kachin States exposed many children to an environment of violence and exploitation.

Early and Forced Marriage: The law stipulates different minimum ages for marriage based on religion and gender. The minimum age for Buddhists is 18, while the minimum age for non-Buddhists is 16 for boys and 15 for girls. Child marriage still occurred, especially in rural areas. There were no reliable statistics on forced marriage.

Sexual Exploitation of Children: Children were subjected to sex trafficking in the country, and a small number of foreign child-sex tourists exploited children. The law does not explicitly prohibit child-sex tourism, but it prohibits pimping and prostitution, and the penal code prohibits sex with a minor younger than 14. The penalty for the purchase and sale of commercial sex acts from a child younger than 18 is 10 years’ imprisonment. The law prohibits child pornography and specifies a minimum penalty of two years’ imprisonment and a fine of 10,000 kyats ($6.60). On July 23, the Child Rights Law was enacted; it provides for one to seven years’ imprisonment, a fine of one million to two million kyats ($660 to $1,320), or both for sexual trafficking or forced marriage. If a victim is younger than 14, the law considers the sexual act statutory rape. The maximum sentence for statutory rape is two years’ imprisonment when the victim is between the ages of 12 and 14 and 10 years to life imprisonment when the victim is younger than 12. On March 25, the penal code was amended; the penalty for rape against a girl younger than 12 is imprisonment for life or for a term of 20 years.

The country’s antitrafficking in persons law requires a demonstration of force, fraud, or coercion to constitute a child-trafficking offense.

Displaced Children: The mortality rate for internally displaced children in conflict areas was significantly higher than in the rest of the country (see section 2.d.). The United Nations estimated that 53 percent of the 128,000 IDPs in Rakhine State were children; the vast majority of this population was Rohingya. The United Nations estimated that 46 percent of the 100,000 IDPs in Kachin State and 48 percent of the 9,000 IDPs in Shan State were children.

Anti-Semitism

There was one synagogue in Rangoon serving a small Jewish congregation. There were no reports of anti-Semitic acts.

 Trafficking in Persons

See the Department of State’s * Trafficking in Persons Report* at https://www.state.gov/trafficking-in-persons-report/.

Persons with Disabilities

The law prohibits discrimination against persons with physical, sensory, hearing, intellectual, and mental disabilities. The law directs the government to ensure that persons with disabilities have easy access to public transportation. The government did not effectively enforce these provisions.

Civil society groups reported that children with disabilities attended school through secondary education at a significantly lower rate than other persons; many never attended school due to stigma and lack of any accommodation for their needs.

Persons with disabilities reported stigma, discrimination, and abuse from civilian and government officials. Students with disabilities cited barriers to inclusive education as a significant disadvantage.

Military veterans with disabilities received official benefits on a priority basis, usually a civil service job at pay equivalent to rank, but both military and ethnic-minority survivors of conflict in rural areas typically did not have access to livelihood opportunities or affordable medical treatment. Official assistance to civilian persons with disabilities in principle included two-thirds of pay for a maximum of one year for a temporary disability and a tax-free stipend for permanent disability. The law providing job protection for workers who become disabled was not implemented.

National/Racial/Ethnic Minorities

Wide-ranging governmental and societal discrimination against minorities persisted, including in areas such as education, housing, employment, and access to health services. Ethnic minorities constituted 30 to 40 percent of the population. The seven ethnic minority states comprised approximately 60 percent of the national territory, and significant numbers of minorities also resided in the country’s other regions.

International observers noted significant wage discrepancies based on religious and ethnic backgrounds were common.

Burmese remained the mandatory language of instruction in government schools. The government’s official education plan does not cover issues related to mother-tongue instruction, but ethnic languages have been taught as extra subjects in government schools since 2013. Outside of Mon State, however, progress has been limited due to resource constraints, the nonstandardization of regional languages, a lack of educational material in minority languages, and varying levels of interest. In schools controlled by armed ethnic groups, students sometimes had no access to the national curriculum.

Tension between the military and ethnic minority populations, while somewhat diminished in areas with cease-fire agreements, remained high, and the military stationed forces in some ethnic groups’ areas of influence and controlled certain cities, towns, and highways. Ethnic armed groups, including the Kachin Independence Army, the Karen National Union, and the AA, pointed to the presence of large army contingents as a major source of tension and insecurity. Reported abuses included killings, beatings, torture, forced labor, forced relocations, and rapes of members of ethnic groups by government soldiers. Some groups also committed abuses (see section 1.g.).

The name Rohingya refers to a predominantly Muslim ethnic group that claims to have lived in what is now Rakhine State for generations. In 2016 the government began to refer to the group as “Muslims in Rakhine State.” Many military and government officials, however, continued to use the term “Bengali,” which the Rohingya consider pejorative as it suggests they are not from Burma. The “Bengali” term is also used on identification documents, including as the person’s race on his or her citizenship card if he or she was naturalized.

The Rohingya faced severe discrimination based on their ethnicity and sometimes their religion. Most Rohingya faced extreme restrictions on their ability to travel; use health-care services; engage in economic activity (see section 7.d.); obtain an education; register births, deaths, and marriages (see section 2.d.); freely practice their faith; and participate in political processes (see section 3). Most of those displaced in 2012 remained confined to semipermanent camps with severely limited access to education, health care, and livelihoods.

The government required Rohingya to receive prior approval for travel outside their village of residence and prohibited them from working as civil servants, including as doctors, nurses, or teachers. Authorities in northern Rakhine State forced Rohingya to work and arbitrarily arrested them. Authorities required Rohingya to obtain official permission for marriage and limited the registration of children to two per family, although local enforcement of the two-child policy was inconsistent. NGOs reported the government resumed issuing birth certificates to Rohingya newborns in northern Rakhine State, although Rohingya born in the last two decades generally did not have birth certificates.

Rohingya were restricted in their ability to construct houses or religious buildings. Authorities continued to prevent Rohingya from accessing mosques in Rakhine State.

The military and other security forces committed widespread atrocities against Rohingya villagers starting in 2017 that were documented during the year, including extrajudicial killings, rape, torture, arbitrary arrest, and burning of hundreds of villages, religious structures, and other buildings. These atrocities and associated events have forced more than 700,000 Rohingya to flee to Bangladesh as of October and constituted ethnic cleansing against the Rohingya.

Acts of Violence, Discrimination, and Other Abuses Based on Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity

Consensual same-sex sexual activity remains illegal under the penal code, which contains a provision against “unnatural offenses” with a penalty of a maximum of 10 years’ imprisonment and a fine. Laws against “unnatural offenses” apply equally to both men and women, but were rarely enforced. Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and intersex (LGBTI) persons reported that police used the threat of prosecution to extort bribes. While the penal code was used more for coercion or bribery, LGBTI persons, particularly transgender women, were most frequently charged under so-called shadow and disguise laws. These laws use the justification that a person dressed or acting in a way that is perceived as not being in line with their biological gender is in “disguise.” According to a local NGO, transgender women reported higher levels of police abuse and discrimination than other members of the LGBTI community.

In March 2018 authorities in Rangoon used the “unnatural offenses” law to charge an openly gay restaurant owner for allegedly sexually assaulting a male member of his staff. As of November the case continued.

Political reforms in recent years made it easier for the LGBTI community to hold public events and openly participate in society, yet discrimination, stigma, and a lack of acceptance among the general population persisted. There were reports of discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity in employment. LGBTI persons reported facing discrimination from medical-care providers.

HIV and AIDS Social Stigma

There were continued reports of societal violence and discrimination, including employment discrimination, against persons with HIV/AIDS. Negative incidents, such as exclusion from social gatherings and activities; verbal insults, harassment, and threats; and physical assaults continued to occur. Laws that criminalize behaviors linked to an increased risk of acquiring HIV/AIDS remain in place, directly fueling stigma and discrimination against persons engaged in these behaviors and impeding their access to HIV prevention, treatment, and care services.

High levels of social stigma and discrimination against female sex workers and transgender women hindered their access to HIV prevention, treatment, and social protection services. Police harassment of sex workers deterred the workers from carrying condoms.

Other Societal Violence or Discrimination

Anti-Muslim sentiment and discrimination persisted. Members of Buddhist nationalist groups, including members of Ma Ba Tha, continued to denigrate Islam and called for a boycott of Muslim businesses and the establishment of “Muslim-free” villages.
Muslim communities complained about unequal treatment by police, pressures to practice Islam in private, difficulty in obtaining citizenship cards, close monitoring of their travel or denials of travel requests by local governments, and restrictions on educational opportunities. In addition, some Muslims reported discrimination by private parties in renting housing.

Anti-Muslim hate speech was prevalent on social media, in particular on Facebook, the most popular social media platform in the country. Independent reporting indicated that the military, using false accounts, was also responsible for generating and promulgating hate-speech content.

Multiple sources noted that restrictions on Muslims and Christians impeded their ability to pursue higher education and assume high-level government positions; Muslims also were unable to invest and trade freely.

Section 7. Worker Rights

a. Freedom of Association and the Right to Collective Bargaining

The law provides for the right of workers to form and join independent unions, bargain collectively, and conduct legal strikes. The law permits labor organizations to demand the reinstatement of workers dismissed for union activity, but it does not explicitly prohibit antiunion discrimination in the form of demotions or mandatory transfers, nor does it offer protection for workers seeking to form a union. The law does not provide adequate protection for workers from dismissal before a union is officially registered.

Laws prohibit civil servants and personnel of the security services and police from forming unions. The law permits workers to join unions only within their category of trade or activity, and the definition of trade or activity lacks clarity. Basic labor organizations must have a minimum of 30 workers and register through township registrars with the Chief Registrar’s Office of the Ministry of Labor, Immigration, and Population (Ministry of Labor). Township labor organizations require a minimum of 10 percent of relevant basic labor organizations to register; regional or state labor organizations require a minimum of 10 percent of relevant township labor organizations. Each of these higher-level unions must include only organizations within the same trade or activity. Similarly, federations and confederations also require a minimum number of regional or state labor organizations (10 percent and 20 percent, respectively) from the next lower level in The law permits labor federations and confederations to affiliate with international union federations and confederations.

The law provides for voluntary registration for local NGOs, including NGOs working on labor issues. Organizations that choose to register are required to send organizational bylaws and formation documents to the government. Broader restrictions on freedom of assembly remained in place (see section 2.b.).

The law gives unions the right to represent workers, to negotiate and bargain collectively with employers, and to send representatives to a conciliation body or conciliation tribunal. Union leaders’ rights to organize, however, are only protected after the official registration of the union. The law does not contain detailed measures regarding management of the bargaining process, such as requiring bargaining to be in good faith or setting parameters for bargaining or the registration, extension, or enforcement of collective agreements. The National Tripartite Dialogue Forum (NTDF), with representatives from government, business, and labor unions, met three times during the year. The NTDF consults with parliament on revising legislation on labor.

The law stipulates that disputes in special economic zones be settled in accordance with original contracts and existing laws. The government appointed a labor inspector for each such zone and established zonal tripartite committees responsible for setting wage levels and monitoring the ratio of local and foreign labor.

In May parliament passed an amended law on the settlement of labor disputes; however, the implementing regulations remained under draft. The law continues to provide the right to strike in most sectors, with a majority vote by workers, permission of the relevant labor federations, and detailed information and three days’ advance notice provided to the employer and the relevant conciliation body. The law does not permit strikes or lockouts in essential services. For “public utility services” (including transportation; cargo and freight; postal; sanitation; information, communication, and technology; energy; petroleum; and financial sectors), lockouts are permitted with a minimum of 14 days’ notice provided to the relevant labor organizations and conciliation body. Strikes in public utility services require generally the same measures as in other sectors, but with 14 days’ advance notice and negotiation between workers and management before the strike takes place to determine maintenance of minimum service levels. The law prohibits strikes addressing problems not directly relevant to labor issues.
The amended law no longer defines complaints as “individual” or “collective,” but as “rights-based” or “benefits-based.” A “rights-based” dispute includes violations of labor laws, whereas a “benefits-based” dispute pertains to working conditions. The type of dispute determines the settlement procedure. Under the amended law, “rights-based” disputes do not go through a conciliation process or an arbitration proceeding, but go directly to court proceedings. The amended law significantly increases fines for labor violations, but it eliminates prison terms as punishment for violations.

Labor groups continued to report labor organizations’ inability to register at the national level, a prerequisite for entering labor framework agreements with multinational companies, due to the registration requirements under the law. In addition, the International Labor Organization (ILO), labor activists, and media outlets continued to report employers firing or engaging in other forms of reprisal against workers who formed or joined labor unions. Trade unions reported cases in which criminal charges were filed against workers for exercising their right to strike, and trade union members were arrested and charged with violating peaceful assembly laws when holding demonstrations regarding labor rights generally. Labor organizations also reported that local labor offices imposed unnecessary bureaucratic requirements for union registration that were inconsistent with the law.

Workers and workers’ organizations continued to report they generally found the Ministry of Labor to be helpful in urging employers to negotiate, but there were consistent reports of employers engaging in forms of antiunion discrimination.

b. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Laws nominally prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labor, although it is allowed for use by the military and in penal institutions. Laws also provide for the punishment of persons who impose forced labor on others. The government did not effectively enforce the law.

The law provides for criminal penalties for forced labor violations; penalties differ depending on whether the military, the government, or a private citizen committed the violation. The penalties are insufficient to deter forced labor.

The government established an interim complaints mechanism under the authority of the President’s Office with the aim of having a more fully developed mechanism at a later date. The ILO and unions expressed concerns that the government’s mechanism does not provide for protections for victims.

The ILO reported the number of complaints of forced labor was decreasing. Reports of forced labor occurred across the country, including in conflict and cease-fire areas, and the prevalence was higher in states with significant armed conflict.

The military’s use of forced labor in Rakhine, Kachin, and Shan States remained a significant problem, according to the ILO. Forced labor reports included forced portering and activities related to the military’s “self-reliance” policy. Under this policy, military units are responsible for procuring their own food and labor supplies from local villagers—a major factor contributing to forced labor and other abuses.

Although the military and the government received complaints logged by the complaints mechanism, no military perpetrators have been tried in civilian court; the military asserted that commissioners and other ranks were subjected to military justice.

Prisoners in the country’s 48 labor camps engaged in forced labor (see section 1.c., Prison and Detention Center Conditions).

The ILO did not receive any verified reports of forced labor in the private sector. Domestic workers remain at risk of domestic slavery.

Also see the Department of State’s Trafficking in Persons Report at https://www.state.gov/trafficking-in-persons-report/.

c. Prohibition of Child Labor and Minimum Age for Employment

The law does not prohibit all of the worst forms of child labor. In July parliament passed the Child Rights Law, which set the minimum age at 14 for work in certain sectors, including shops, establishments, and factories; the law establishes special provisions for “youth employment” for those older than 14. There is, however, no minimum age for work for all sectors in which children were employed, including agriculture and informal work. Some sector-specific laws identify activities that are prohibited for children younger than 18. The law prohibits employees younger than 16 from working in a hazardous environment, and the government has prepared a hazardous work list enumerating occupations in which child labor is specifically prohibited.

Trained inspectors from the Factories and General Labor Laws Inspection Department monitored the application of these regulations, but their legal authority only extends to factories. In addition, inspectors were hindered by a general lack of resources.

The Ministry of Labor worked with other ministries to collect better data on existing child labor and continued a campaign directed at parents to raise awareness of the risks of child labor and provide information on other education options available to children. The Ministry of Labor engaged with the Ministry of Education on two programs: one to bring children out of the workplace and put them in school, the other to support former child soldiers’ pursuit of classroom education or vocational training. The Labor Ministry supported vocational schools to train young workers for jobs in nonhazardous environments.

The ILO noted the widespread mobilization and recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. Penalties under the law and their enforcement for other child labor violations were insufficient to deter violations.

The government did not effectively enforce the law. Child labor remained prevalent and highly visible. Children were at high risk, with poverty leading some parents to remove them from schools before completion of compulsory education. In cities children worked mostly as street vendors or refuse collectors, as restaurant and teashop attendants, and as domestic workers. Children also worked in the production of garments.

Children often worked in the informal economy, in some instances exposing them to drugs and petty crime, risk of arrest, commercial sexual exploitation, and HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted infections (also see section 6). Children were vulnerable to forced labor in teashops, agriculture, and begging. In rural areas children routinely worked in family agricultural activities, occasionally in situations of forced labor.

Also see the Department of Labor’s Findings on the Worst Forms of Child Labor report at https://www.dol.gov/agencies/ilab/resources/reports/child-labor/findings and the Department of Labor’s List of Goods Produced by Child Labor or Forced Labor at https://www.dol.gov/agencies/ilab/reports/child-labor/list-of-goods.
d. Discrimination with Respect to Employment and Occupation

Labor laws and regulations do not specifically prohibit employment discrimination.

Women remained underrepresented in most traditionally male-dominated occupations (mining, forestry, carpentry, masonry, and fishing) and were effectively barred from certain professions.

There were reports government and private actors practiced anti-Muslim discrimination that impeded Muslim-owned businesses’ operations and undercut their ability to hire and retain labor, maintain proper working standards, and secure public and private contracts. There were reports of discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity in employment, including the denial of promotions and firing of LGBTI persons. Activists reported job opportunities for many openly gay and lesbian persons were limited and noted a general lack of support from society as a whole. Activists reported that in addition to general societal discrimination, persons with HIV/AIDS faced employment discrimination in both the public and private sectors, including suspensions and the loss of employment following positive results from mandatory workplace HIV testing.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The official minimum daily wage was above the poverty line. The minimum wage covers a standard eight-hour workday across all sectors and industries and applies to all workers except for those in businesses with fewer than 15 employees. The law requires the minimum wage to be revised every two years. Labor unions and activists criticized the May 2018 raise in the minimum wage as too small for workers to keep up with the rising cost of living.

The law requires employers to pay employees on the date their salary is due for companies with 100 or fewer employees. For companies with more than 100 employees, the employer is required to pay employees within five days from the designated payday. Overtime cannot exceed 12 hours per workweek, should not go past midnight, and can exceed 16 hours in a workweek only on special occasions. The law also stipulates that an employee’s total working hours cannot exceed 11 hours per day (including overtime and a one-hour break). The law applies to shops, commercial establishments, and establishments for public entertainment.
The law sets the terms and conditions required for occupational safety, health, and welfare. It was not clear if workers could remove themselves from situations that endanger their health or safety without jeopardizing their employment.

The Ministry of Labor’s Factories and General Labor Laws Inspection Department oversees labor conditions in the private sector. The government did not effectively enforce the law. The number of labor-law inspectors and factory inspectors was insufficient to address occupational safety and health standards, wage, salary, overtime, and other issues adequately. In some sectors other ministries regulated occupational safety and health laws (e.g., the Ministry of Agriculture, Livestock, and Irrigation). Workers’ organizations alleged government inspections were rare and often announced with several days’ notice that allowed factory owners to bring facilities--often temporarily--into compliance. Corruption and bribery of inspectors reportedly occurred.

The public sector was reasonably likely to respect labor laws; frequent violations occurred in private enterprises. Workers continued to submit complaints to relevant government agencies and the dispute settlement mechanism.

Several serious industrial accidents occurred during the year. In April, for example, more than 50 miners died in an accident at a jade mine.
This map is presented for information only. The Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade accepts no responsibility for errors or omission of any geographic feature. Nomenclature and territorial boundaries may not necessarily reflect Australian government policy. Provided by the Commonwealth of Australia under Creative Commons Attribution 3.0 Australia licence.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>CONTENTS</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ACRONYMS</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1. PURPOSE AND SCOPE</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. BACKGROUND INFORMATION</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Recent History</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Demography</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Economic Overview</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Political System</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Human Rights Framework</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Security Situation</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. REFUGEE CONVENTION CLAIMS</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Race/Nationality</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Religion</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Political Opinion (Actual or imputed)</td>
<td>36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Groups of Interest</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. COMPLEMENTARY PROTECTION CLAIMS</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arbitrary Deprivation of Life</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Death Penalty</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Torture</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5. OTHER CONSIDERATIONS</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>State Protection</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Internal Relocation</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Treatment of Returnees</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Documentation</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prevalence of Fraud</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Acronym</td>
<td>Full Form</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---------</td>
<td>-----------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AA</td>
<td>Arakan Army</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ARSA</td>
<td>Arakan Rohingya Salvation Army</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BGP</td>
<td>Border Guard Police</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BSPP</td>
<td>Burma Socialist Programme Party</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CSC</td>
<td>Citizenship Scrutiny Card</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CTFMR</td>
<td>Country Task Force on Monitoring and Reporting</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DFAT</td>
<td>Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EAO</td>
<td>Ethnic armed organisation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GAD</td>
<td>General Administration Department</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GBV</td>
<td>Gender-based violence</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GDP</td>
<td>Gross domestic product</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICNV</td>
<td>Identity Card for National Verification</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICRC</td>
<td>International Committee of the Red Cross</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IDP</td>
<td>Internally displaced person</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IOM</td>
<td>International Organization for Migration</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>KIA</td>
<td>Kachin Independence Army</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>KNLA</td>
<td>Karen National Liberation Army</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>KNU</td>
<td>Karen National Union</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LGBTI</td>
<td>Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transsexual and intersex</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MNDA</td>
<td>Myanmar National Democratic Alliance Army</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MHNRC</td>
<td>Myanmar National Human Rights Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MP</td>
<td>Member of Parliament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MSF</td>
<td>Médecins Sans Frontières (Doctors Without Borders)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NCA</td>
<td>Nationwide Ceasefire Agreement</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NGO</td>
<td>Non-government organisation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NMSP</td>
<td>New Mon State Party</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Full Form</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NLD</td>
<td>National League for Democracy</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NRC</td>
<td>National Registration Card</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NVC</td>
<td>National Verification Card</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OCHA</td>
<td>Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PEC</td>
<td>Presidential Electoral College</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SLORC</td>
<td>State Law and Order Restoration Council</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TNLA</td>
<td>Ta'ang National Liberation Army</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TRC</td>
<td>Temporary Registration Card</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UEC</td>
<td>Union Election Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UN</td>
<td>United Nations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UNHCR</td>
<td>United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UPR</td>
<td>Universal Periodic Review</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>USDP</td>
<td>Union Solidarity and Development Party</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UWSA</td>
<td>United Wa State Army</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
GLOSSARY

Amyotha Hluttaw  upper house of parliament
Ma Ba Tha  the Burmese acronym for the Committee Protection of Nationality and Religion, an organisation led by nationalist Buddhist monks
Madressa  a Muslim school, college, or university that is often part of a mosque
Ma Ha Na  the Burmese acronym for the State Sangha Maha Nayaka Committee, the highest Buddhist authority in Myanmar
Ma Ka Pa  the Burmese acronym for the Committee for the Prevention of the Illegal Immigration of Foreigners
Na Sa Ka  the Burmese acronym for the Border Area Immigration Control Headquarters
Na Ta La  the Burmese acronym for the National Races Youth Development Training Schools
Pat Jasan  a Kachin Baptist Convention movement against drugs known in English as ‘Prohibit Clear’
Pyidaungsu Hluttaw  national parliament
Pyithu Hluttaw  lower house of parliament
Pyithu Sit  armed groups of civilians trained by the military, known as ‘People’s Militias’
Sa Ya Pa  the Burmese acronym for the Myanmar Intelligence Office of the armed forces
Tatmadaw  the Myanmar military
Tilaka  a red facial marking practiced in Hinduism

Terms used in this report high risk  DFAT is aware of a strong pattern of incidents moderate risk  DFAT is aware of sufficient incidents to suggest a pattern of behaviour low risk  DFAT is aware of incidents but has insufficient evidence to conclude they form a pattern official discrimination

  1. legal or regulatory measures applying to a particular group that impede access to state protection or services that are available to other sections of the population (examples might include but are not limited to difficulties in obtaining personal registrations or identity papers, difficulties in having papers recognised, arbitrary arrest and detention)

2. behaviour by state employees towards a particular group that impedes access to state protection or services otherwise available, including by failure to implement legislative or administrative measures societal discrimination

1. behaviour by members of society (including family members, employers or service providers) that impedes access by a particular group to goods or services normally available to other sections of society (examples could include but are not limited to refusal to rent property, refusal to sell goods or services, or employment discrimination)

2. ostracism or exclusion by members of society (including family, acquaintances, employers, colleagues or service providers)
1. PURPOSE AND SCOPE

1.1 The Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT) has prepared this Country Information Report for protection status determination purposes only. It provides DFAT’s best judgement and assessment at time of writing and is distinct from Australian government policy with respect to Myanmar.

1.2 The report provides a general, rather than an exhaustive country overview. It has been prepared with regard to the current caseload for decision makers in Australia, without reference to individual applications for protection visas. The report does not contain policy guidance for decision makers.

1.3 Ministerial Direction Number 56 of 21 June 2013 under s 499 of the Migration Act 1958 states that:

> Where the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade has prepared a country information assessment expressly for protection status determination processes, and that assessment is available to the decision maker, the decision maker must take into account that assessment, where relevant, in making their decision. The decision maker is not precluded from considering other relevant information about the country.

1.4 This report draws on DFAT’s on-the-ground knowledge and discussions with a range of sources in Myanmar. It takes into account relevant information from government and non-government sources, including but not limited to those produced by the United Nations (UN) Independent International Fact-Finding Mission; other relevant UN agencies including the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR); the US Department of State, recognised human rights organisations including Amnesty International; and reputable news organisations. Where DFAT does not refer to a specific source of a report or allegation, this may be to protect the source.

1.5 This updated Country Information Report replaces the previous DFAT report released on Myanmar published on 10 January 2017.
2. BACKGROUND INFORMATION

RECENT HISTORY

2.1 Myanmar, formerly known as Burma, is a parliamentary republic, situated on the Bay of Bengal and the Andaman Sea. The second-largest country in southeast Asia by area, it shares borders with Bangladesh and India to the north-west, China to the north-east and Laos and Thailand to the east. The capital city is Naypyidaw, a planned city founded in the mid-2000s. The old capital, Yangon (formerly known as Rangoon), is Myanmar’s largest city and its economic centre. Myanmar is prone to natural disasters, including cyclones and flooding. In May 2008, Cyclone Nargis caused severe damage across the Ayeyarwady Delta region, reportedly killing around 140,000 people. In August 2018, monsoon flooding across Myanmar displaced more than 150,000 people.

2.2 The Union of Burma achieved independence from Britain in 1948, initially as a parliamentary democracy under the leadership of General Aung San (the father of the State Counsellor, Aung San Suu Kyi). A military coup in 1962 brought General Ne Win to power, and he ruled through the Burma Socialist Programme Party (BSPP) for 26 years. Under the BSPP’s ‘Burmese Way to Socialism’, Myanmar became one of the most isolated countries in the world. Many ethnic groups sought greater independence during this time, often through protracted armed insurgencies.

2.3 General Ne Win stood down in 1988 following widespread demonstrations—which were in part about rice shortages—and demands for an elected civilian government to replace the BSPP regime. The military (known as the Tatmadaw) responded by announcing a military-backed State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC, renamed the State Peace and Development Council in November 1997). The SLORC restored order through violent military and police crackdowns from August 1988. Some sources claim that at least 3,000 people were killed over six weeks in Yangon and Mandalay, though the exact number of casualties is unknown.

2.4 Violence and the arrest of many opposition figures undermined the 1990 elections. Despite this, opposition groups and ethnic parties opposed to the government won 475 out of the 485 non-military seats available. The SLORC did not recognise the results of the election, and senior opposition figures, including Aung San Suu Kyi, were imprisoned. Senior General Than Shwe continued military rule until 30 March 2011, establishing Myanmar’s current Constitution in 2008.

2.5 The November 2010 parliamentary elections were boycotted by the opposition National League for Democracy (NLD) and considered not credible by international observers. The military-backed Union Solidarity and Development Party (USDP) won over 75 per cent of the non-military seats available (see Political System). The new parliament convened in January 2011 and appointed Thein Sein, a general in the Tatmadaw and Prime Minister under Than Shwe, as President.

2.6 Thein Sein’s government initiated a series of political and economic reforms that set in motion a period of rapid and transformational change for Myanmar. They released hundreds of political prisoners, including Aung San Suu Kyi from house arrest six days after the 2010 elections. Aung San Suu Kyi and other members of the NLD party contested parliamentary by-elections on 1 April 2012 for 45 seats in the union, state and regional parliaments. International observers considered the by-elections credible. The NLD won 43 of the 44 seats it contested; Aung San Suu Kyi was one of those elected.

2.7 In November 2015, Myanmar held credible nationwide elections for the first time since 1960. More than 23 million people voted for more than 6,000 candidates from 91 political parties for the bicameral national parliament (Pyidaungsu Hluttaw). The NLD won almost 80 per cent of the 75 per cent of seats not reserved for the military. The public, other parties and candidates, and international observers accepted the election result. The new government was in power by March 2016 (see Political System).

2.8 The NLD was elected on a platform of economic development, constitutional reform and national reconciliation. However, Myanmar’s democratic transition has come under scrutiny internationally, due to the lack of progress in undertaking substantive reform, slow momentum with the peace process, and the government’s failure to uphold fundamental human rights for populations affected by ongoing violence (see Security Situation).

DEMOGRAPHY

2.9 Myanmar’s estimated population in 2017 was 55.1 million. In April 2014, the first national census in more than 30 years counted the national population at 51.4 million people. This included estimates of the population sizes of various communities in Rakhine, Kachin and Karen (also known as Kayin) States that were not directly surveyed due to conflict (Kachin and Karen States) or sensitivities regarding ethnicity (Rakhine State; see Rohingya).

2.10 In 2017, around 70 per cent of Myanmar’s population lived in rural areas. Of the cities, Yangon has the highest population with around 5.1 million people, followed by Mandalay with around 1.4 million. The states of Chin and Kayah (also known as Karenni) are the least populated, with fewer than half a million people residing in each.

2.11 Myanmar’s Citizenship Law (1982) officially recognises 135 ethnic groups. Some ethnic minorities living in Myanmar are not included in this list. Information on the size of these ethnic populations was collected during the 2014 census, but has not yet been released by the government. The Bamar ethnic group is the largest in Myanmar, making up around 68 per cent of the population, followed by Shan (9 per cent), Karen (7 per cent), and Rakhine (4 per cent). Other significant ethnic groups in Myanmar include the Mon, Chin, Kayah, and ethnic Chinese and Indian populations, as well as a group of Muslim people who identify as Rohingya. DFAT acknowledges that use of the term ‘Rohingya’ is highly sensitive in Myanmar (see Rohingya).

2.12 At the time of the 2014 census, the majority of people in Myanmar were Buddhists (87.9 per cent), although there were also significant minority populations of Christians (6.2 per cent) and Muslims (4.3 per cent), and a smaller group (2 per cent) belonging to animist or other religious groups. The Muslim population in Myanmar has decreased following the mass movement of Rohingya to Bangladesh in 2017 (see Security Situation, Rakhine State, and Rohingya).

ECONOMIC OVERVIEW

2.13 Myanmar is a lower-middle income country with significant economic potential. The countries with which it shares its borders (Bangladesh, India, China, Laos and Thailand) are home to approximately 40 per cent of the world’s population; it is located near key maritime trade routes; and has significant natural resources. In 2018, Myanmar’s gross domestic product (GDP) per capita was forecasted at USD 1,354 (approximately AUD 1,920), the highest since 2014. Myanmar’s services sector accounts for around 40 per cent of GDP, followed by the industrial sector (35 per cent) and the agriculture sector (25 per cent).
2.14 Despite strong growth in recent years, Myanmar remains one of Asia’s poorest countries and ranked 148th out of 189 countries and territories in the UN Development Programme (UNDP) 2018 Human Development Index. Over a third of Myanmar’s population live in poverty, with rates substantially higher in rural areas (39 per cent) compared to urban areas (14.5 per cent). Economic activity is centralised in major urban centres, particularly Yangon and Mandalay.

2.15 According to the World Bank, economic growth is expected to moderate from 6.8 per cent in 2017-18 to 6.2 per cent in 2018-19, driven by a slowdown in both the services sector and industrial activities. The World Bank projects GDP growth of 6.6 per cent by 2020-21, driven by an expected pickup in foreign and domestic investment as a result of recent policy changes, including large investments in infrastructure projects. Inflation is expected to rise from 5.4 per cent in 2017-18 to 8.8 per cent in 2018-19. The lack of employment opportunities in rural areas has driven increased rates of rural-urban migration (see Employment).

2.16 The state exerts significant influence over the economy, but reforms implemented since 2011 have increased competition for military-owned businesses. The abolition of the Tatmadaw-controlled Trade Council, which approved all export and import licences, and the removal of the tax-exempt status of Tatmadaw businesses, has opened up these enterprises to greater competition, particularly in the manufacturing and processing sectors. However corruption, weak rule of law and complex licensing systems remain major barriers to investment and trade, and Myanmar is consistently ranked at the lower end of Transparency International’s Corruption Perceptions Index, ranked 130th of 180 countries in 2017. Corruption is reported at both national and local levels and recent government initiatives aimed at curbing it, including the Anti-Corruption Commission established in 2014, have produced limited results.

2.17 Myanmar’s 2014 National Social Protection Strategic Plan remains the key policy underpinning welfare provision to vulnerable groups, and is implemented by the Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief and Resettlement. In 2016, the government reaffirmed the plan’s eight flagship areas targeting pregnant women, children, persons with disabilities and the elderly, and extended pilot programs focused on the provision of cash allowances and pensions. From March 2017, seniors over 90 years old with National Registration Cards (NRCs, see National Identity Cards) and household registration lists (see Household Registration Lists) are eligible for pension payments of MMK 10,000 (approximately AUD 9) per month; in October 2018, the minimum age was lowered to 85 years. The government provides financial and technical assistance to over 80 privately run aged care facilities nationwide. Social service delivery is limited in rural, remote and border areas (see Health and Education).

Health

2.18 Health outcomes are generally poor in Myanmar, and worse in rural areas. According to the World Health Organization, Myanmar has low life expectancy rates (67 years), high maternal mortality rates (200 per 100,000 live births), and high infant mortality rates (51 per 1,000 live births). Around one third of children are stunted, with the highest incidence in Rakhine State. Myanmar spends only around three per cent of GDP on healthcare, and the standard of health services is generally inadequate, even in major urban centres. Communicable diseases such as tuberculosis, malaria and HIV/AIDS are leading causes of death and illness.

2.19 There are significant disparities between regions and groups in the access to, and quality of, health services, particularly for ethnic minorities, poor people, and people living in remote areas. Limited infrastructure, rugged and remote terrain and ongoing conflict are key constraints to the effective delivery of health services in some parts of the country, particularly during the monsoon season. Private healthcare has expanded rapidly in recent years, particularly in cities, and volunteers and members of local non-government organisations (NGOs) and faith-based organisations also provide health services at the village level.

2.20 In many of Myanmar’s contested regions, parallel government and ethnic armed organisation (EAO) systems provide health services. In Kachin and Shan States, most internally displaced persons (IDPs), particularly in non-government controlled areas, continue to rely on humanitarian assistance for basic health services and facilities available in China, as their access to services and referral systems in Myanmar remains limited. In Rakhine State, in addition to long-standing limitations in general health service provision, there are continued restrictions on access to health facilities and township hospitals for the Muslim population, including IDPs (see Rohingya, Freedom of movement). The Ministry of Health has recently implemented mobile health teams in northern Rakhine, but their reach appears to have been limited. In October 2018, ethnic Rakhine and Mro people described expensive transport and poor roads in northern Rakhine as the primary constraints to accessing the nearest medical facilities.

2.21 Myanmar has two mental health hospitals, in Yangon and Mandalay, as well as mental health wards in hospitals in all 14 states and regions. Treatment is considered affordable for many, but access to and quality of services is more limited for people living outside of urban areas. Religious and cultural beliefs and social stigma surrounding mental illness reportedly prevent people from accessing professional services.

2.22 There is widespread drug use (particularly heroine and amphetamines) in Kachin State and Shan State, and is reportedly a growing problem elsewhere. This is largely affecting youth and contributing to urban safety issues and crime. The Kachin Baptist Convention created the Pat Jasan (Prohibit Clear) movement in 2014 as a “people’s war on drugs”. Pat Jasan vigilantes reportedly slash poppy fields and force drug users into drug treatment camps. The movement gained popularity due to the perception that local authorities were not effectively addressing drug issues. Drug production is also a major resource for war economies in the north of Myanmar.

2.23 In February 2018, the government released a new national drug control policy, coinciding with amendments to the Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Law (1993). These developments mark a shift in the government’s approach to drug management, from punitive action and supply reduction to one incorporating harm minimisation. However, the establishment in June 2018 of a Drug Activity Special Complaint Department to receive information from the public has been described by some as being inconsistent with the new policy, as this type of approach typically drives arrests and prosecutions and can limit users’ access to services. There are 70 drug treatment centres nationwide, and some hospitals including Yangon’s Mental Health Hospital offer methadone treatment to inpatients and outpatients. Social stigma prevents some users from seeking treatment, and some non-government services for injection drug users in Yangon have decreased in recent years because of community protest.

Education

2.24 Myanmar’s prolonged internal conflict, isolation over the years of military rule, lack of funding and use of education as a tool of social control, have created ongoing problems in the education sector. This includes difficulties in retaining students at both primary and secondary levels, and producing graduates with the skills necessary to raise economic productivity. However since 2015, the government has prioritised the reform of the education sector to improve education quality.

2.25 In Myanmar, education is compulsory and free until fourth grade. Myanmar’s adult literacy rate is around 93 per cent. Enrolment rates at primary school are very high, estimated at 100 per cent in 2016, but drop rapidly at secondary and tertiary levels of education, with enrolment rates of 51 per cent and 14 per cent at secondary and tertiary levels respectively. This drop-off in enrolments at secondary and tertiary levels of education is reflected in the average number of years of education, which is around 4.7 years in Myanmar compared with 5.2 years in Laos, 8 years in Vietnam and 7.9 years in Thailand. Some schools charge informal fees, to supplement the minimal government resources provided for education.

2.26 Children in rural and remote areas, and in areas affected by conflict, face additional challenges in obtaining an education. In some schools, particularly those in ethnic and religious minority areas, students are not routinely taught the national curriculum (for example, see Christians). Education and training opportunities are limited for Myanmar nationals (predominantly Karen) in the refugee camps on the Thai border. While camp education is considered to be of a higher standard than that available in Myanmar, there are limited opportunities for tertiary education, and qualifications attained remain largely unrecognised outside the camps.

2.27 Students from religious minority groups, particularly Muslims, experience unequal access to secondary and tertiary education (see Muslims). The government’s 2017 National Education Strategic Plan did not address issues related to mother tongue instruction. Local media reported that the General Administration Department (GAD) issued an order in June 2018 that required madrassas and mosques to only use Burmese language, and only hold religious classes and services in permitted places. Recent, reliable data on state-approved madrassas are rare; a 1997 Ministry of Defence report stated there were 759 madrassas nationally. According to Muslim leaders, the government has not approved the opening of new madrassas (and mosques) since 1962 (see Muslims).

Employment

2.28 Myanmar has a high workforce participation rate, with many more men (82 per cent) than women (47 per cent) working. However 38 per cent of people are underemployed (defined as working part-time or not using their skills and qualifications), and 75 per cent of jobs are in the informal sector. Half of the working population are employed in the primary sector (agriculture, forestry and fishing), with the highest proportion in Chin (81 per cent) and Shan (75 per cent) States. In Karen and Kachin States, most people (62 and 54 per cent) work in the primary sectors, followed by the tertiary (services) (28 and 32 per cent) and secondary (manufacturing) (10 and 14 per cent) sectors.

2.29 Yangon and Mandalay have become major hubs for domestic labour migrants, and 25 per cent of Yangon’s population are lifetime migrants from other states and regions. Most of Yangon’s population (58 per cent) are employed in the tertiary sector, with smaller numbers in the secondary (26 per cent) and primary (16 per cent) sectors. There is greater distribution across the primary (43 per cent), secondary (20 per cent) and tertiary (37 per cent) sectors in Mandalay.

2.30 According to 2014 census data, the national unemployment rate was 4 per cent, but levels of unemployment vary considerably between states and regions. Unemployment was highest in Rakhine (10 per cent), Karen (8 per cent) and Mon (6 per cent) states. Anecdotally, the conflict in Kachin State is reported to have created high youth unemployment and increased general migration to Yangon for work; DFAT assesses that conflicts in other areas of Myanmar have likely created similar conditions.

POLITICAL SYSTEM

2.31 The Constitution divides power between the executive, legislature and judiciary. The Tatmadaw reserves 25 per cent of seats in parliament, giving it the ability to block any reforms to the Constitution. It also appoints the Ministers for Defence, Home Affairs and Border Affairs. The Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces also has the right to invoke extraordinary powers, including to dissolve the civilian government and parliament and rule directly upon presidential declaration of a state of emergency.
2.32 Myanmar is divided administratively into seven regions, seven states, six self-administered zones or divisions, and one ‘union territory’ (where the capital, Naypyidaw, is located). Despite the difference in terminology, states and regions are constitutionally equivalent.

2.33 The six self-administered zones/divisions in Myanmar are recognised under the Constitution. Ethnic minority groups govern these areas; five are located within Shan State and one within Sagaing Region. The largest is the Wa Self-Administered Division, bordering China in the eastern part of Shan State.

2.34 Under the Constitution, the legislative power of the Union is shared among the central and the state and regional parliaments, although in practice, power is heavily centralised in the national executive and the national parliament. The President has the power to appoint the chief ministers of states and regions, and chief ministers are directly responsible to the President, rather than to their respective state or regional parliament. National legislation overrides state and regional law under the Constitution.

2.35 Each state and region has its own legislature, comprising elected officials and appointed administrators. While taxation is formally centralised, state governments typically collect informal revenues through land repossessions and sales, local contracts and administrative levies. Myanmar’s judicial, law enforcement and administrative structures do not have uniform reach across the country. Representatives from government revenue and service delivery agencies rarely travel to the more inaccessible areas of Myanmar due to poor transportation and telecommunications infrastructure, and instability and conflict.

2.36 The national parliament is made up of the People’s Assembly (Pyithu Hluttaw, the lower house) and the House of Nationalities (Amyotha Hluttaw, the upper house); the two houses combine to form the Pyidaungsu Hluttaw to discuss certain issues, such as national budgets, and to resolve deadlocks. The People’s Assembly consists of 440 representatives, of which 330 are directly elected from single-member electorates and 110 are military personnel appointed by the Commander-in-Chief. The House of Nationalities consists of 224 representatives, of which 168 are directly elected (12 from each of the states and regions) and 56 are military personnel appointed by the Commander-in-Chief.

2.37 The President is elected by the Presidential Electoral College (PEC), which comprises lower house members of parliament (MPs), upper house MPs and military MPs. Each of these three groups elects one Vice President. The combined PEC (comprising all representatives in the national parliament) then elects one of the three Vice Presidents to be President. The President and the remaining two Vice Presidents serve in those roles for a five-year term. Section 59 (f) of the Constitution includes several eligibility criteria for Presidential and Vice-Presidential nominees, including that neither the nominee’s parents nor any of their children can be foreigners. On these grounds, Aung San Suu Kyi is ineligible for the presidency because her two sons have British citizenship. In January 2019, the Pyidaungsu Hluttaw passed a motion to establish a committee to recommend amendments to the Constitution. The NLD introduced the motion following party discussions of a number of possible constitutional amendments, including removing the military-appointed Vice President position and amending section 59 (f).

2.38 The parliamentary elections held in November 2015 resulted in a landslide victory for the NLD. The NLD won almost 80 per cent of the popularly elected seats in the national parliament (and a similar proportion in state and regional parliaments), despite receiving just 57 per cent of the popular vote, due to the first-past-the-post electoral system. The incumbent military-aligned USDP won just eight per cent of elected seats, and parties representing ethnic minorities won 11 per cent of elected seats, well below expectations. The Buddhist nationalist National Development Party, which had the fourth-most candidates of all parties contesting the election, failed to win a seat. The results gave the NLD enough seats to choose a President and to pass legislation on its own. International electoral observers concluded that the election outcome reflected the will of the people, though anti-Muslim rhetoric, the exclusion of Muslim candidates, and the disenfranchisement of Rohingya Muslims marred the election campaign.
2.39  In March 2016, the parliament elected NLD nominee Htin Kyaw as President, with retired Lieutenant General Myint Swe (nominated by the military representatives) and Henry Van Thio (also nominated by the NLD) appointed as Vice Presidents. Aung San Suu Kyi was appointed to the new and constitutionally undefined position of State Counsellor, and holds the key portfolios of Foreign Minister and Minister of the President’s Office. Htin Kyaw resigned in March 2018 and Win Myint, NLD member and speaker of the lower house since 2012, was elected by majority in both houses of parliament. As provided by the Constitution, the positions of Ministers for Defence, Home Affairs and Border Affairs are held by members of the defence services nominated by the Commander-in-Chief. Home Affairs is responsible for the Myanmar Police Force and the court system.

2.40  While 95 political parties (including 50 ethnic parties) have registered with the Myanmar Union Election Commission (UEC) since the multi-party system began in 2011, the USDP and NLD have dominated electoral politics. In August 2018, the UEC approved a new political party started by members of the ’88 Generation group (formed from the 1988 pro-democracy movement), known as the People’s Party. The People’s Party plan to contest the 2020 general election.

2.41  In November 2018, 13 by-elections were held across union, state and regional parliaments. Of the 11 seats in play held by the NLD, seven were retained and four lost. Three of the lost seats went to USDP in Tamu (Sagaing), Seikkan (Yangon) and Myitkyina (Kachin). Observers and parties questioned the transparency around military voting. A Chin ethnic party won the remaining seat in Matupi (Chin).

HUMAN RIGHTS FRAMEWORK

2.43  In 2015, Myanmar underwent its second Universal Periodic Review (UPR), the process by which the UN Human Rights Council reviews the human rights records of all 192 UN Member States every four years. Of the 281 recommendations made by 93 countries, the government accepted 135 and noted 146. The third cycle of the UPR is tentatively scheduled for 2020.

2.44  In December 2017, the government withdrew country access for and cooperation with Yanghee Lee, UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Myanmar, for the duration of her tenure. The decision was in response to Lee’s statement following her July 2017 visit to Myanmar.

2.46  In September 2018, the UN Human Rights Council adopted a resolution that established an independent mechanism to collect evidence of the most serious international crimes committed in Myanmar. It also extended the mandate of the UN Fact-Finding Mission until September 2019.
National Human Rights Institution

2.47 Myanmar established the government-funded Myanmar National Human Rights Commission (MNHRC) in 2011, with a broad legal mandate to protect and promote human rights. The Myanmar National Human Rights Commission Law (2014) enables the MNHRC to receive public complaints, investigate human rights abuses, hold the government accountable for the treaties and conventions to which Myanmar is a party, and make recommendations on additional treaties and conventions for accession. It also allows MNHRC to undertake inspections to prisons, detention centres and other places of confinement. Following its investigations, the MNHRC refers its recommendations to the relevant government department for action, but has no power to ensure recommendations are implemented.

2.48 Administrative and financial independence from the government is limited. However the MNHRC has recently taken steps to reform its financial procedures, including submitting its 2016-17 budget to the parliament through the Ministry of Finance (rather than obtaining Presidential approval on the budget as per previous practice). The selection process for commissioners is opaque. There are currently 10 commissioners (including the Chairperson who heads the MNHRC), most of whom are former civil servants, and three of whom are former military employees, which has raised questions about the MNHRC’s ability to operate independently. The MNHRC appointed a female commissioner in April 2018, after a period of having only male commissioners. Civil society representatives described their engagement with the MNHRC as neither regular nor substantive, and public confidence for the MNHRC as limited.

2.49 The International Coordinating Committee of National Institutions for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights currently classifies the MNHRC as a ‘B status institution’, meaning that the MNHRC is not fully compliant with the Paris Principles relating to the Status of National Institutions, which set out the minimum international standards required by human rights institutions to be considered credible and to operate effectively. The MNHRC has been criticised for refusing to investigate human rights abuses in conflict areas, particularly those reportedly committed by the Tatmadaw, on the basis that it is not part of its mandate. Its prioritisation of human rights promotion over protection was the subject of parliamentary criticism in July 2016. In November 2018, the Asia Pacific Forum for National Human Rights Institutions conducted a capacity assessment for the MNHRC, with a view to develop staff capacity and improve the effectiveness and efficiency of internal processes.

SECURITY SITUATION

2.50 Conflicts between ethnic groups and the state have been ongoing since independence in 1948. In recent decades, conflict has mostly been restricted to contested areas in the border states and regions; the ethnic Bamar heartland has been largely unaffected by conflict.

2.51 Of the 21 active EAOs, 15 were included, or chose to participate, in negotiations for a Nationwide Ceasefire Agreement (NCA). Of these, only eight signed the agreement in October 2015, despite all 15 subsequently agreeing to draft text in March 2016. The eight signatories were the Chin National Front, the All Burma Students’ Democratic Front, the Arakan Liberation Party, the Restoration Council of Shan State, the Karen National Union (KNU), the KNU/Karen National Liberation Army (KNLA) Peace Council, the Democratic Karen Buddhist Army, and the Pa-O National Liberation Organization. Two more EAOs, the New Mon State Party (NMSP) and the Lahu Democratic Union, signed on to the NCA in early 2018, taking the total number of signatories to 10. While not all EAOs signed the agreement, the partial signing of the NCA marked a significant step towards advancing the peace process in Myanmar. At present, however, forward momentum on political dialogue under the NCA is challenging, with two major EAOs (the KNU and the Restoration Council of Shan State) suspending all participation in NCA-linked formal dialogue in late 2018.
2.52 Many EAOs also remained outside the NCA negotiation process, including the powerful United Wa State Army (UWSA, with 30,000 personnel) and the Kachin Independence Army (KIA, around 10,000 personnel). While these and other groups chose not to participate, the military excluded three EAOs because of their involvement in clashes with the Tatmadaw during negotiations: the Myanmar National Democratic Alliance Army (MNDAA), the Arakan Army (AA), and the Ta’ang National Liberation Army (TNLA). Recently, however, there have been signs that the government, including the military, are willing to negotiate with these three groups. In December 2018, the Commander-in-Chief, Senior General Min Aung Hlaing, called a temporary unilateral ceasefire effective in active conflict areas in north and northeast Myanmar until April 2019 in order to progress negotiations; notably this did not include the AA in Rakhine State (see Rakhine State). Despite this, conflict between the AA and the Tatmadaw has increased including outside Rakhine State, and the prospects for peaceful negotiations with the AA appear unlikely.

2.53 Linked to the NCA, in August 2016, the government held the first Union Peace Conference or the ‘21st Century Panglong Conference’, a reference to the Panglong Conference held in 1947 and led by General Aung San, which led to the formation of the Union of Burma. Attendees included the government, the Tatmadaw, signatory and non-signatory EAOs (but not the MNDAA, AA or TNLA), and civil society representatives. Political dialogue with signatories to the NCA made early progress, agreeing 37 principles, addressing political, economic, environmental and social issues signed as the first part of the Union Peace Accord. Two further conferences have been held, reaching agreement on 51 principles of a Union Peace Accord. Following the third conference in July 2018, discussions are focused on more contentious issues, primarily federalism and security sector reform. Substantive progress on these issues has not been achieved to date and trust between warring parties remains low.

2.54 Despite the NCA, parts of the country remain affected by ongoing conflict. In some areas, the government does not exercise control and EAOs continue to clash with government forces. These conflicts, which occur predominantly in border areas in southern Kachin State, northern Shan State, and recently in southern Chin State and Rakhine State, have displaced significant numbers of the local population and further eroded trust in the peace process (see Kachin and Shan States and Rakhine State). Of the EAOs currently involved in hostilities in Kachin and Shan States, only the Shan State Army-South has signed the NCA, but the group continue to clash with the Tatmadaw.

2.55 While the NCA committed all parties to end the use of landmines and cooperate on mine-clearance operations, new landmines have reportedly been laid in recent years. The UN recorded 199 casualties (including 42 deaths) in Kachin State, and 182 casualties (including 48 deaths) in Shan State from landmines from 2016 to April 2018. In 2017, at least two deaths in Chin State were attributed to the indiscriminate laying of landmines by the AA. Landmines were also reported to have been planted by the Tatmadaw in and around Rohingya villages as part of the 2017 security operations in Rakhine State, and along border crossing points in northern Maungdaw Township, resulting in death and injury.

2.56 In March 2017, the UN Human Rights Council established the UN Fact-Finding Mission to investigate alleged recent human rights violations in Rakhine, Kachin and Shan States. Their investigation was informed by 875 interviews with victims and eyewitnesses in Bangladesh, Indonesia, Malaysia, Thailand and the UK (but not in Myanmar, as the government did not provide permission to enter). The UN Fact-Finding Mission found sufficient evidence of violence perpetrated by the Tatmadaw in northern Rakhine State to conclude that war crimes, crimes against humanity, and, potentially, genocide occurred. The government did not accept these findings and is conducting its own Independent Commission of Enquiry, the eighth internal enquiry into events. The Commission is expected to report in August 2019.

2.57 In addition to the larger-scale conflicts in Rakhine, Kachin and Shan States, recent clashes were also reported in southern Chin State and Karen State. Fighting in Chin State between the AA and Tatmadaw has been ongoing since 2015. The worst clashes reported in November 2017 and May 2018 led to approximately 1,300 people and 1,200 people respectively fleeing Chin State for India. DFAT is aware of reports of indiscriminate killings, cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment including the use of ethnic Chin as human shields, forced labour and forced displacement by the AA and the Tatmadaw in Paletwa Township. While historically AA activities have been predominantly confined to Paletwa Township, other areas of Chin State, particularly Matupi Township, are reported to have become increasingly militarised by the Tatmadaw since 2017 and clashes between the AA and Tatmadaw escalated over November and December 2018, including in northern Rakhine State. As at February 2019, clashes between the AA and Tatmadaw continued.

2.58 The KNU and Karen civil society have alleged that since 2017 the Tatmadaw has been expanding its presence in some parts of Karen State in violation of the NCA. In March 2018, clashes between the Tatmadaw and the KNU/Karen National Liberation Army (KNLA) displaced over 1,500 people from 15 villages in Hpakung district, which constituted the largest forced displacement since the KNU signed a bilateral ceasefire in 2012, and a violation of the NCA. Civil society groups reported that the Tatmadaw shot at villagers. Clashes also broke out in March between the NMSP and KNU, which are both NCA signatories. A smaller clash between the Tatmadaw, KNU and a Democratic Karen Benevolent Army Splinter group also occurred in Hpakung in August 2018, but the KNU has subsequently reaffirmed its commitment to the NCA, despite suspending formal participation in NCA-linked dialogue (it maintains it is focusing on informal discussions to build agreement).

Rakhine State

2.59 The security situation in Rakhine State deteriorated rapidly after two outbreaks of violence in 2012. These affected ethnic Rakhine (mostly Buddhists) and minority Muslim communities (both the population that identify as Rohingya and the Kaman) across 12 townships. The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported that the security forces, sometimes in cooperation with Rakhine civilians, committed serious human rights violations against Rohingya and Kaman across Rakhine State between 2012 and 2013, including the burning of houses, looting of shops and extrajudicial and indiscriminate killings, including of women, children and the elderly. Violence decreased between 2014 and late 2016, although the situation was extremely fragile with significant impacts on the rights of communities (see Rohingya and Muslims).

2.60 On 9 October 2016, the Arakan Rohingya Salvation Army (ARSA), an insurgent group based in Rakhine State, carried out its first attack on three Border Guard Police (BGP) facilities in Maungdaw Township, northern Rakhine State. According to the authorities, nine police officers and eight ARSA members were killed, and ARSA seized guns and ammunition. The security forces, led by the Tatmadaw, launched a major ‘clearance operation’ in response to the attacks, sealing off a large area of northern Maungdaw. The presence of security forces increased and movement of the Rohingya population was tightly controlled through ongoing movement restrictions, curfews and checkpoints. There were widespread and systematic arson attacks against Rohingya villages with over 1,500 buildings destroyed between October and December 2016. The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported a range of serious human rights violations against the Rohingya population by the security forces during the 2016 security operations, including arbitrary arrests, ill-treatment and torture, forced disappearances and sexual violence. Around 87,000 Rohingya fled to Bangladesh.

2.61 On 25 August 2017, ARSA launched coordinated attacks on a military base and up to 30 security force outposts across northern Rakhine State. A small number of armed leaders with limited training were supported by a much larger group of untrained villagers with knives and sticks, and 12 security force personnel were killed. The security force response, launched within hours of the attack, was disproportionate, encompassing almost the total Rohingya population across Maungdaw, Buthidaung and Rathedaung Townships. Despite the geographic spread of the security operations, the strategy was consistent — Tatmadaw soldiers, other security forces, Rakhine men, and in some cases, men from other Fighting is aerial bombing offensives against the KIA, with counterattacks by the KIA. Credible sources reported the Tatmadaw people remain in IDP camps due to ongoing fighting. and the Tatmadaw reignited in 2015 Kachin and Shan States continued were ongoing result of the conflict 2.65 been used as human shields and porters, with at least one c blocking transport routes to areas of central Rakhine, resulting in food shortages. Civilians have reportedly credible reports Buthidaung Township increased from November 2018. In January 2019, c 2.64 Paik ho imagery taken over different period security outposts, but the security force response was limited. Following the August 2017 violence in Rakhine State, the government restricted all humanitarian access to northern Rakhine State. In central Rakhine, UNHCR regained access to some IDP camps and rural Muslim villages in January 2018, but did not regain access to northern Rakhine until months later. In January 2018, ARSA claimed responsibility for an ambush against Myanmar security personnel in northern Rakhine State that injured five people. This was the first attack claimed by ARSA since the August 2017 attacks against security outposts, but the security force response was limited. In December 2018, Reuters published satellite imagery taken over different periods in 2018 which showed new security infrastructure and Buddhist housing built on the site of cleared Rohingya villages including in Inn Din, Thit Tone Nar Gwa Son and Done Paik. 2.63 Following the August 2017 violence in Rakhine State, the government restricted all humanitarian access to northern Rakhine State. In central Rakhine, UNHCR regained access to some IDP camps and rural Muslim villages in January 2018, but did not regain access to northern Rakhine until months later. In January 2018, ARSA claimed responsibility for an ambush against Myanmar security personnel in northern Rakhine State that injured five people. This was the first attack claimed by ARSA since the August 2017 attacks against security outposts, but the security force response was limited. In December 2018, Reuters published satellite imagery taken over different periods in 2018 which showed new security infrastructure and Buddhist housing built on the site of cleared Rohingya villages including in Inn Din, Thit Tone Nar Gwa Son and Done Paik. 2.64 The frequency and severity of armed clashes between the Tatmadaw and the AA in Rakhine State increased from November 2018. In January 2019, coordinated attacks by the AA on four police outposts in Buthidaung Township, Rakhine State, killed 13 police officers and wounded nine others. DFAT considers credible reports of the Tatmadaw threatening and detaining civilians they accuse of supporting the AA, and blocking transport routes to areas of central Rakhine, resulting in food shortages. Civilians have reportedly been used as human shields and porters, with at least one civilian being shot and wounded. 2.65 As at February 2019, thousands of people were estimated to be displaced in Rakhine State as a result of the conflict. The majority of the displaced were reported to have fled in late December 2018, indicating that despite reports of additional deployment of Tatmadaw battalions and activity, there had not been a large-scale escalation in fighting. As at February 2019, clashes between the AA and the Tatmadaw were ongoing, and reports of human rights violations including forced labour and arbitrary detention continued.

Kachin and Shan States

2.66 In 2011, a 17-year ceasefire between the KIA and the Tatmadaw collapsed. Fighting between the KIA and the Tatmadaw reignited in 2015, with clashes intensifying from late 2017. Approximately 100,000 people remain in IDP camps due to ongoing fighting. In December 2017, the Tatmadaw conducted several offensives against the KIA, with counterattacks by the KIA. Credible sources reported the Tatmadaw used aerial bombings, mortars, surface-to-surface missiles, landmines and artillery, hostages and human shields. Fighting is influenced by the control of natural resources. Jade, amber, gold, timber and iron are abundant in the region and are controlled by various interests, including the Tatmadaw and its associates, EAOs and militias.

2.67 Fighting was particularly intense in Tanai Township from late January 2018, with the Tatmadaw using airstrikes and heavy artillery, including in areas close to civilian populations and IDP camps. Local humanitarian organisations estimated close to 3,000 civilians fled the immediate conflict area, and up to 500 civilians (primarily migrant workers) were trapped in the battle zone, without access to food, shelter or health services. Individuals were screened at military checkpoints in Samat (along the sole escape route) to ensure they were not KIA, resulting in only 200 to 300 people being allowed through each day. Hundreds of civilians were also displaced in other parts of Kachin, and media reported 21 people were abducted by KIA fighters in January 2018, with some people subsequently released.

2.68 According to humanitarian organisations, clashes heightened in February 2018, resulting in civilian casualties and the displacement of thousands of people, including from long-term IDP camps. Civilians were trapped in the conflict zone for extended periods, and local and international humanitarian organisations were restricted by the government in KIA-held areas (where around 50 per cent of people are displaced). Even in government-controlled areas, access by humanitarian organisations is severely limited; UN international staff have not been able to reach IDPs beyond towns since 2016, though some local staff have greater access. DFAT does not have information on whether people outside of IDP camps and towns are able to access any assistance or protection beyond their own means. Both the Tatmadaw and the KIA have been accused of failing to distinguish between civilians and combatants in their operations, and actions from both parties have prevented humanitarian access to people in need.

2.69 Conflicts in April 2018 newly displaced more than 5,000 people, in addition to the 100,000 people that have been displaced since 2011. While some IDPs were able to return to their villages of origin by June, they required humanitarian assistance, including food and livelihood support as they were displaced during the growing season. Those displaced were not able to travel freely. In addition to conflict between the Tatmadaw and the KIA, there has also been increased inter-ethnic tension between the Kachin and Shanni (Red Shan) groups in south-west Kachin State, and Kachin and Shan groups in the south of Kachin State.

2.70 In Shan State, conflict has been characterised by a complex mix of armed actors and shifting territorial control. It has also fuelled the illicit drug economy, with drug production occurring in safe havens held by militias and other paramilitary units associated with the Tatmadaw, as well as in areas controlled by EAOs. Sporadic fighting between the Tatmadaw and EAOs primarily occurs in northern Shan, the most ethnically diverse, administratively fragmented and disputed region of Myanmar, and fighting intensified in December 2017 and again in mid-2018. The Myanmar Institute for Peace and Security reported 52 armed clashes and six mine incidents across 14 townships in Shan State in July and August 2018, which represented a relatively high number of clashes for the rainy season. In August 2018, fighting between the Tatmadaw and the TNLA moved into Lashio Township, northern Shan, which had not previously been affected by conflict.

2.71 While fighting in Shan State has primarily occurred between the Tatmadaw and EAOs, clashes have also occurred between the TNLA and Shan State Army-South, sometimes with assistance from Shan State Army-North (backed by the UWSA). For example, 300 civilians reportedly fled Mongton Township in March 2018, following clashes between the two EAOs. Civilians were also reportedly trapped in the crossfire and evacuated by aid workers. Furthermore, fighting between the TNLA and Shan State Army-South in August 2018 occurred in close proximity to civilian areas, including IDP camps, and displaced more than 900 people in Namtu Township. Both local and international humanitarian organisations reported limited access to conflict areas.

2.72 As at October 2018, more than 2,000 civilians had been displaced in northern Shan due to armed clashes between the Tatmadaw, KIA, TNLA, and the Shan State Army-South and North, including 1,400 civilians still displaced in Lashio Township. In October 2018, 40 civilians were reportedly recruited by Northern Alliance EAOs (AA, KIA, MNDA and TNLA) in Kutkai Township, and landmines injured several civilians in Namhsan and Nankham Townships.

2.73 While large numbers of IDPs in Kachin and Shan States have been able to return to their places of origin, the UN Fact-Finding Mission reported that as at August 2018, around 97,000 people in Kachin and 9,000 people in Shan remained in displacement camps or camp-like situations. Many have been displaced for prolonged periods of up to seven years, and some displaced multiple times. At the time of publication, the government was developing a national strategy for closing IDP camps in Kachin, Shan, Rakhine and Karen States.

2.74 The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported that most EAOs fighting in Kachin and Shan States have, to different extents, committed international humanitarian law violations. DFAT assesses that the abuses committed by EAOs in both Kachin and Shan States has been lesser in number and severity than those committed by the Tatmadaw. DFAT further assesses that many of the reported tactics and violations by the Tatmadaw in Kachin are comparable to those in Rakhine State (see Rakhine State), although on a smaller scale and without the incitement of intercommunal violence seen in Rakhine.
3. REFUGEE CONVENTION CLAIMS

RACE/NATIONALITY

3.1 The Myanmar government recognises eight major ethnic groups (the Kachin, Kayah/Karenni, Karen/Kayin, Chin, Bamar, Mon, Rakhine and Shan) as part of 135 ‘national races’, and the law grants full citizenship to members of these races. Under the Citizenship Law, an ethnic group must have been present ‘in any of the territories included within the State’ continuously since 1823 for its members to be entitled to full citizenship. The law restricts members of other groups from full citizenship (see Documentation). The Constitution recognises those national races with greater than 0.1 per cent of the national population (‘National races with suitable population’) by allocating seats in state and regional parliaments to members of these groups.

3.2 The Bamar are the majority ethnic group in Myanmar, comprising approximately 68 per cent of the population. Bamar people dominate the bureaucracy and the political system, and are often appointed to leadership positions in states or regions even where other ethnic groups form the majority. The central plains of Myanmar have a higher concentration of Bamar than remote areas, including major cities. The vast majority of ethnic Bamar people are Buddhist.

3.3 The Rohingya are not among the 135 recognised ethnic groups, nor are people of Indian, Chinese, Anglo-Burmese or Nepali descent. The formal restrictions on people who do not hold full citizenship are broad. Proof of citizenship is usually required to access state-funded health and education services, although in practice, those with the ability to pay can sometimes secure access to these services. They typically cannot work for state, regional or central governments.

3.4 Identity in Myanmar is complex, involving elements of ethnicity, religion, language and geographic location. Different members of the same family may identify as belonging to different races, and people’s officially recognised race or religion may be different to how they self-identify. Marriages between different ethnic groups are common, particularly between people who are of different ethnicity but share a religion.

Rohingya

3.5 DFAT acknowledges that there is debate in Myanmar around the origins and historical validity of the term ‘Rohingya’. Many in Myanmar, including the ethnic Rakhine (mostly Buddhist) population, contest this term and claim that the Rohingya are illegal immigrants from Bangladesh and should be recognised and known as ‘Bengali’.

3.6 The vast majority of Rohingya are Sunni Muslim, and live in Rakhine State (formerly known as Arakan State), particularly the northern area that encompasses the townships of Maungdaw and Buthidaung. Prior to the 2017 violence, both Maungdaw and Buthidaung had significant Muslim majority populations (around 75-90 per cent). Following the mass displacement of Rohingya to Bangladesh, population figures are no longer known. Rohingya in northern Rakhine typically do not speak Burmese, only Rohingya and sometimes Rakhine languages. There are smaller communities of Rohingya in many other townships in Rakhine State, including Sittwe, Pauktaw and Myebon. In Sittwe and other towns, Rohingya interact with ethnic Rakhine (also known as Arakanese) and can speak both Burmese and Rakhine language, though interaction is limited by a number of factors including movement restrictions (see Rohingya, Freedom of Movement). The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported that the majority of the Rohingya and Rakhine they interviewed described productive relationships between the two ethnic groups before the 2012 violence, including business interactions and friendships.

3.7 Official figures of the size of the national Rohingya population are not available, as this group was excluded from the 2014 census on the basis that their ethnicity was not recognised. However, the census used mapping data to estimate the size of the population not counted in Rakhine State. This mapping process indicated that approximately 1.1 million people were ‘not counted because they were not allowed to self-identify using a name that is not recognised by the government’. This estimate is broadly in line with most credible estimates of the Rohingya population in Rakhine State before the August 2017 violence. The UN Fact-Finding Mission estimated that at September 2018, between 200,000 and 240,000 Rohingya remained in the northern townships of Rathedaung, and 360,000 in central Rakhine. In addition, UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) reported more than 900,000 Rohingya remained in Bangladesh at the end of 2018 (for further information on the Rohingya population in Bangladesh, see DFAT’s Country Information Report on Bangladesh, published on 2 February 2018). Up to 6,000 Rohingya were reported to be stranded on the ‘zero line’ on the Myanmar side of the border in February 2018.

3.8 DFAT assesses that official and societal discrimination on the basis of ethnicity against Rohingya in Rakhine State is high, endemic and severe. They typically lack citizenship, face severe restrictions on their freedom of movement and are the subject of systemic extortion and harassment. These issues combine to restrict this community’s access to livelihoods and to essential services, including in education and health. Rohingya have also been subjected to extreme violence by the security forces, and to a lesser extent, the ethnic Rakhine population (see Security Situation and Rohingya, Violence). The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported episodes of violence between Buddhists and Muslims across the country in recent years, primarily in Rakhine State, and high levels of religious and ethnic tensions remain at the time of publication. DFAT assesses there is a high risk of further violence for the remaining Rohingya in Rakhine State.

Citizenship

3.9 Up until the late 1980s, all Myanmar citizens were issued formal identity documentation known as National Registration Cards (NRCs), and many residents of Rakhine State, including Rohingya, held NRCs. Non-citizens were issued Foreign Registration Certificates. In 1989, the government carried out a ‘citizenship scrutiny’ exercise as part of the implementation of the Citizenship Law. During this process, NRCs were replaced with full, naturalised or associate Citizenship Scrutiny Cards (CSCs). Under the Citizenship Law, many Rohingya are formally eligible for associate or naturalised citizenship, but very few have been issued CSCs of any type following the citizenship scrutiny exercise. While this is largely due to the unwillingness of government officials to provide citizenship to Rohingya, many Rohingya also reject the categories of associate or naturalised citizenship, on the basis that they implicitly deny the existence of Rohingya in Myanmar before 1823, and legally reinforce what Rohingya see as the inaccurate view that Rohingya are immigrants from Bangladesh. Associate and naturalised citizenship categories confer fewer rights than full citizenship (see Documentation).
3.10 In 1995, the government began to issue Temporary Registration Cards (TRCs) (known as ‘white cards’) to those who identified as Rohingya. However in 2015 then-President Thein Sein declared white cards invalid, thus removing the only formal identity documentation available to the Rohingya. Temporary Approval Cards (known as ‘white card receipts’) were given out in exchange for TRCs, reportedly as part of a plan to reinstate identification documents at a later date. However, these were not accepted as valid documentation for the purposes of voting in the 2015 elections, or to stand as candidates, or form political parties.

3.11 From June 2015, the government began issuing a new ‘identity card for national verification’ (ICNV). DFAT understands that as few as 1,000 people were issued this card in 2015. Rohingya applicants were required to identify as ‘Bengali’ on the ICNV, and rights associated with the ICNV, including its limited two-year validity, were unclear. The UN Fact-Finding Mission described a campaign to coerce Rohingya to accept the ICNV, and increased restrictions on those with white card receipts in parts of northern Rakhine State.

3.12 From 2016, the government restarted the process to determine who is a citizen under the Citizenship Law. Rohingya were requested to undergo a ‘citizenship verification process’ (as opposed to the ‘citizenship process’ for members of the 135 recognised ethnic groups), and issued National Verification Cards (NVCs). The NVC does not specify religion or ethnicity, it has no expiry date and it is the current form of identity documentation required for Rohingya by the government. Reports of coercion to accept the NVC increased following the October 2016 violence, however as at January 2017, only around 6,000 NVCs had been issued in Rakhine State, compared with nearly 400,000 white cards which were surrendered, in part reflecting the decreased trust in the authorities from the Rohingya population.

3.13 In August 2017, the Advisory Commission on Rakhine State, a government established body chaired by former UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, made a number of recommendations to improve the government’s citizenship verification process for Rohingya, including making the process voluntary. However the government has specified that Rohingya seeking repatriation from Bangladesh will be required to undergo citizenship verification and receive NVCs (see Conditions for Returnees). In addition, from October 2017 authorities began requesting NVCs to permit fishing in central Rakhine, which is a key source of income for many Rohingya.

3.14 Despite these restrictions specified by authorities, the rights provided by the NVC remain opaque. In theory, NVC holders are permitted to travel anywhere in Myanmar, however in practice this is limited by the rules and regulations of local areas (see Freedom of Movement, and Movement restrictions in Rakhine, Kachin and Shan States). In February 2018, the government advised DFAT that a NVC is required by Rohingya in order to access basic services such as health and education. Despite this, most Rohingya remain unwilling to participate in the citizenship verification process and accept NVCs on the basis that it may remove their right to remain in Myanmar long-term, or establish them as a lower class of citizen with fewer rights. As a result, the vast majority remain undocumented – or holding a white card receipt – and are effectively stateless. This is having significant implications in particular for the registration of new births in the Rohingya community (see Birth and Death Certificates, and National Identity Cards). Credible sources reported that Rohingya also face difficulties in legally obtaining passports.

Violence

3.15 According to Human Rights Watch, large-scale violent attacks against the Rohingya have occurred repeatedly since Myanmar’s independence, and Rohingya have migrated across the region in large numbers to escape violence. Violence against the Rohingya by security forces, including torture, indiscriminate killings, and mass rapes were reported during and following the 2012 and 2016 outbreaks. However these occurred on an unprecedented scale in the August 2017 security operations. Multiple credible sources have reported the widespread, large-scale and extreme violence against the Rohingya in northern Rakhine State in 2017, by security forces, groups affiliated with the security forces and ethnic Rakhine mobs, based on interviews with victims and eyewitnesses, satellite imagery, documents, photographs and videos.

3.16 The US Department of State reported that the security operations explicitly targeted Rohingya, while neighbouring non-Rohingya sites (for example Buddhist stupas), and critical infrastructure (including mobile phone towers) were undamaged. Other credible sources in Myanmar reported that villages with mixed Muslim and ethnic Rakhine populations were mostly unaffected. During the operations, Rohingya homes and property were destroyed, and thousands of Rohingya killed and injured. Violence typically lasted between one to four days, depending on the size of the village, and patterns of violence across locations indicated pre-meditation. In some villages, warnings about the impending violence were issued to Muslim community leaders from local Tatmadaw and police, and in others ethnic Rakhine neighbours were witnessed leaving before the outbreaks of violence.

3.17 In March 2018, MSF estimated at least 9,400 people died in Rakhine State between 25 August and 24 September 2017 of which at least 6,700 were due to violence, including at least 730 children under the age of five. MSF reported the main cause of violence-related deaths during this period was gunshots (70 per cent), including for children under five (59 per cent). Around 9 per cent were burned to death in their homes, higher (around 15 per cent) for children under the age of five who died violently. Five per cent of people who died violently were beaten to death, three per cent from sexual violence and one per cent from landmines. MSF concluded that the estimated number of deaths was conservative given their survey methodology, and information collected by the UN Fact-Finding Mission corroborated this statement. While the month following the ARSA attacks has been described as the most violent, multiple credible sources recorded a high number of violent incidents against Rohingya in northern Rakhine State continuing until November 2017, despite the official conclusion of security operations by the government on 5 September 2017. Some violent acts constituted torture (see Torture).

3.18 Credible sources report that Rohingya were both targeted (including community or religious leaders), and indiscriminately shot at. This was mostly while fleeing, as evidenced by the high proportion of bullet entry points in victims’ backs, and corroborated through testimony. Rohingya were also injured and killed by bladed weapons, yielded by both security forces and ethnic Rakhine. Many others were killed in arson attacks, including the elderly, persons with disabilities and young children who were unable to escape; in some villages, people were forced into burning houses, or locked into buildings then set on fire. The US Department of State described various tactics used to create mass casualties, including fencing off entire villages before shooting into the crowd.

3.19 All of the above forms of violence were reported to be used in the mass killings in the village of Min Gyi (Tula Toli), Maungdaw Township. Human Rights Watch and the UN Fact-Finding Mission both documented the process of villagers in Min Gyi being gathered together by security forces and ethnic Rakhine, before men and boys were separated and killed. Women and girls were then reportedly taken to nearby houses, gang raped, then killed or severely injured, including from being set on fire in locked houses. Few survived this violent attack, and an estimated 750 people died in Min Gyi. Mass killings were also reported in Maung Nu, Chut Pyin, Gu Dar Pyin, and villages in Koe Tan Kauk village tract. In February 2018, the Associated Press reported on at least five mass graves in Gu Dar Pyin village, northern Rakhine State, based on interviews and footage from displaced Rohingya in Bangladesh. The government denied the existence of the mass graves and reported that ARSA militants had attacked the village on 28 August, which resulted in the killing of 19 ARSA members by security forces. The government acknowledged the existence of a mass grave in Inn Din, but claimed those killed by the Tatmadaw were terrorists (see Media and Extrajudicial Killings).

3.20 Human rights groups have reported the deliberate use of large-scale sexual violence, including rape, by the security forces against Rohingya women and girls. Sexual assaults were reported during home searches, and mass rapes in fields, mosques and schools, by the Tatmadaw in the 12 months leading up to the August 2017 security operations. Sexual violence was reported to increase in scale during the attacks on villages as part of the security operations, and MSF reported over three per cent of interviewees had directly experienced or witnessed sexual violence between 25 August and 24 September, but acknowledged sexual violence may be underrepresented as it is typically underreported due to social stigma in Rohingya culture. The US Department of State documented a much higher number (45 per cent) of its interviewees who witnessed women and girls being raped, including 20 per cent who witnessed gang rape. The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported gang rape by Tatmadaw soldiers occurred in at least ten village tracts of northern Rakhine State.

3.21 The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported that women and girls aged 13 to 25 were targeted for sexual violence, but MSF documented victims from nine to 50 years of age. Women were severely injured before and during rape, including by having their breasts cut off, genitals mutilated or from being raped using knives and sticks. In some cases, victims died from the brutality of the rape and accompanying violence, and in many others perpetrators were reported to have shot, hanged or stabbed victims after raping them. Rapes were often in public, including in front of families and the community. Perpetrators also reportedly left victims’ bodies, with visible signs of rape, in public view. There are also credible reports of men and boys being subjected to genital mutilation, rape, and sexualised torture.

3.22 There are credible reports of security forces, and in some cases ethnic Rakhine, targeting pregnant women, children and babies. Soldiers were reported to attack women, and their infants, during or immediately after childbirth. Several witnesses from different villages also reported soldiers raping and killing pregnant women by slashing their stomachs and removing their fetuses. Soldiers and police were reported to remove infants from their mother’s arms and kill them through various means, including gunshot, knifing, stomping on them, beating them or throwing on the ground. Infants and children were also reportedly thrown into fires, rivers and into village wells. Most of these events occurred in August and September 2017, and were often were carried out in front of the child’s mother.

3.23 The UN Fact-Finding Mission found sufficient evidence of violence perpetrated by the Tatmadaw in northern Rakhine State to conclude that war crimes, crimes against humanity, and potentially, genocide occurred. Given the multiple incidents of extreme violence against the Rohingya in recent years, DFAT assesses that Rohingya in Rakhine State continue to face a high risk of violence, predominantly from security forces.

Freedom of movement

3.24 The movement of Rohingya in Rakhine State is limited by government-imposed regulations, informal rules implemented by authorities, and self-imposed restrictions by communities who fear for their safety outside of their townships. All Rohingya living in Rakhine State require official permission to travel between townships, and outside of Rakhine State.

3.25 Following the widespread violence in Rakhine State in 2012, local authorities and the Ministry of Home Affairs moved some communities into camps and implemented severe movement restrictions. Around 129,000 people remain displaced in camp-like settings in central Rakhine, primarily Rohingya, but also ethnic Kaman (a recognised ‘national race’ whose members are Muslim, see Muslims). They remain segregated, restricted to camps and displacement sites, unable to return to their place of origin and without freedom of movement.

3.26 In August 2017, the Advisory Commission on Rakhine State recommended the government establish a plan to close all IDP camps in Rakhine State. According to the Ministry for Social Welfare, Relief and Resettlement, three IDP camps (housing Rohingya, Kaman and Rakhine IDPs) were closed in 2017. However efforts to close camps have been inconsistent, have not addressed movement restrictions or concerns about the government provision of services to IDPs, nor have all IDPs been given the option of returning to their places of origin. For example, in Rohingya camps that have been “closed”, IDPs have not been relocated or given increased freedom of movement. Instead, shelters have been upgraded and in some instances camp boundaries have been expanded. These “closed” camps are now referred to as “villages”, however residents continue to experience movement restrictions and do not have improved access to land or livelihoods. By comparison, ethnic Kaman IDPs were relocated to Yangon (rather than to their places of origin, as IDPs requested) and issued a stipend, and Rakhine IDPs were largely relocated to an agreed location with newly built homes and infrastructure, including water and electricity. An additional four camps have been identified as priorities for closure, including two in Sittwe Township. The Advisory Commission on Rakhine State also recommended immediate improvements to living conditions within the camps but at the time of publication, conditions remained very poor, including from shelter disrepair, overcrowding, and poor lighting.

3.27 Other Rohingya in central Rakhine, including those in villages or in separate official ‘Muslim enclaves’ such as Aung Mingalar in Sittwe, also face severe restrictions including on freedom of movement. Approximately 4,000 Rohingya and Kaman live in the Aung Mingalar quarter, which has been guarded by armed police, checkpoints and barbed wire since the 2012 violence. With the exception of emergency medical treatment, resident movements are restricted to the displacement camps and sites in rural Sittwe, where a limited number of people can sometimes access markets and buy food. Residents are required to use only a shuttle escorted by police, and to pay the police for the transport.

3.28 Rohingya who live in northern Rakhine State are not permitted to travel outside of northern Rakhine, except for medical emergencies, and restrictions are enforced through curfews and checkpoints. Rohingya are required to obtain travel approval to move even short distances. In December 2017, UNHCR reported that the process for obtaining travel permission had become more stringent. Individuals now require a form of identity card, namely the NVC, NRC or a citizenship document, where previously alternate travel authorisation procedures were available for those who did not hold documentation. Credible sources told DFAT that obtaining travel permits and then using these documents to pass through checkpoints required the payment of ‘informal fees’ at every stage. This can include payment in the form of forced labour. The size of informal payments varies and can be linked to the perception of an individual’s capacity to pay. Amnesty International reported that in addition to extortion, Rohingya are regularly harassed by checkpoint officers with threats and physical violence. There are credible reports that Rohingya remaining in northern Rakhine following the 2017 violence have been prevented from travelling between village tracts, and Maungdaw and Buthidaung Townships, on the basis of security concerns from the authorities.

3.29 The restrictions on movement for Rohingya prevent access to healthcare, education, and income-generating activities. Health services in Rakhine State are generally poor quality. Undeveloped transport infrastructure and discrimination in the delivery of services further impede access to healthcare. For example, Sittwe General Hospital does not allow Rohingya access to the general medical services provided to the rest of the population. Access to the hospital for Rohingya is limited to emergency cases, and treatment is provided in a segregated ward of only 20 beds with lower-standard facilities compared to the rest of the hospital. Rohingya patients are under continual surveillance by security guards, and all require a female guardian (reportedly due to security concerns) who speaks Burmese or Rakhine language to be admitted. Few Rohingya women speak either language, which means families need to pay for a female translator.

3.30 Very basic levels of healthcare are provided in IDP camps. Depending on the camp, clinics are open between one and 25 days per month, during specified hours only. Most large camps have a clinic visit at least one day per week. There is a small permanent health centre inside the Sittwe camp periphery that can provide some out-of-hours care and emergency referrals to Sittwe Hospital. Sittwe is one of the only hospitals that consistently accepts Rohingya for treatment. Rohingya in other parts of the state are referred to Sittwe Hospital even when their local hospital is closer, because several local hospitals do not accept Rohingya for treatment. People in IDP camps are often reluctant to go to hospital (a process which requires a police escort and transportation costs), meaning treatment is often delayed, leading to higher death rates. Access to safe water and sanitation facilities is poor, including in IDP camps. The restrictions on freedom of movement and access to quality healthcare for Rohingya are contributing to poorer health outcomes. While official data on Rohingya are not collected, a wide range of credible sources in Rakhine State told DFAT that malnutrition rates among the Rohingya population are very high, leading to high stunting rates. Maternal health outcomes are also reportedly much poorer for Rohingya compared with the ethnic Rakhine population.

3.31 Movement restrictions also prevent many Rohingya from attending state-run schools. For the approximately 60,000 displaced children in IDP camps in central Rakhine, access to education is limited by a lack of schools, and Rohingya (and Kaman) children in central Rakhine have physical access to only one high school in Thet Kae Pyin, Sittwe Township. University students without CSCs (see National Identity Cards), including Rohingya and some religious minorities, are permitted to attend classes and sit examinations, but are unable to graduate and receive qualifications. Rohingya students have been unable to enrol at Sittwe University since 2012. Movement restrictions for Rohingya in central and northern Rakhine, and additional restrictions on access to fishing, agricultural lands and forests, limit Rohingya access to livelihood opportunities, markets and employment outside their immediate areas. Where travel is permitted (with the required documentation), some Rohingya will choose not to cross checkpoints due to fear of harassment and extortion.

3.32 Rohingya also face restrictions in travelling outside of Rakhine State. Travel permission is only granted to Rohingya holding official identity documents (mostly NVCs, though some still hold NRCs), meaning very few Rohingya are able to travel legally outside of Rakhine State. The process to obtain travel permission from the Rakhine State government is onerous, and involves submitting a copy of their household list, recommendation letters from their Village or Ward Administrator and township police station, and permission from the Township Immigration Office. Permission is restricted to 45 days, and two ‘guarantors’ are required to ensure the applicant returns to Rakhine State before the permission expires. Guarantors are reported to face penalties if this does not occur. Credible sources suggest that Rohingya have been able to obtain travel permission through the payment of bribes. Prior to the 2016 security operations, Rohingya from northern Rakhine State were able to travel to Bangladesh for business or to access healthcare. Immigration and customs officials issued an official document (known as a ‘blue book’) that allowed regularised movements of people, including Rohingya, between Myanmar and Bangladesh. DFAT understands blue books are no longer in use. Following the security operations in 2016 and 2017, one-way, irregular people movement from Myanmar to Bangladesh has dramatically increased, but regular movement between the two countries has been restricted.

Other restrictions on Rohingya in Rakhine State

3.33 A number of other discriminatory official practices, typically enforced through local orders (applicable only within local townships) affect almost all aspects of private life for the Rohingya in Rakhine State. In August 2018, the Union Government announced the abolition of eight local orders mainly targeting the Rohingya, including six issued by the Border Area Immigration Control Headquarters (Na Sa Ka). Information about the specific orders or the implementation of their removal is limited; the below information is based on DFAT’s understanding of local orders at the time of publication.

3.34 Local orders restrict the ability of Rohingya to gather publicly in groups of more than five people, which limits their freedom to worship and can impinge on their ability to work. Restrictions also relate to marriage, and the number and ‘spacing’ of children. The marriage authorisation procedure reportedly involves Rohingya seeking permission, paying high fees, and making a commitment to use contraception to prevent having more than two children (see Women). In 2016, the BGP in Buthidaung Township, northern Rakhine State, were reported to issue additional requirements for marriage permits for Rohingya. This included a letter from the district immigration authorities verifying the couple were of legal age to marry; a letter from a station commander showing the couple was free of criminal offenses; and a letter from a health assistant assuring the couple was free of communicable diseases. Authorisation has taken up to two years in some cases, and credible sources told DFAT that this has contributed to fewer cases of marriage orders than in the past. Rohingya couples who marry without official marriage permission risk criminal punishment, including fines, and any children risk exclusion from the household list (see Household Registration Lists). The Population Control Healthcare Law (2015) also allows township officials to “organise” couples to practice 36-month birth spacing. Rohingya children have also been denied equal access to birth registration (see Birth and Death Certificates).

Rohingya outside Rakhine State

3.35 There are a number of Rohingya living outside of Rakhine State, particularly in Yangon, but the size of the Rohingya population outside Rakhine State is unclear. This is due to both a lack of official statistics that recognise the Rohingya as an ethnic group, and also as some Rohingya in Yangon and other large cities in Myanmar reportedly conceal their ethnic identity, including through attempts to identify as Kaman or other Muslim groups. Anecdotal evidence suggests there are approximately 20,000 Rohingya living in Yangon. Rohingya outside of Rakhine State are not subject to local orders restricting freedom of movement as Rohingya in Rakhine State, however they may choose to live in particular locations due to concern of negative societal attitudes. In February 2018, Rohingya in Yangon described Buddhist neighbours and friends increasingly expressing sympathy with the government’s approach to the Rohingya in Rakhine State.

3.36 Rohingya outside Rakhine State generally have higher incomes and better access to resources than those in Rakhine State, and are typically able to obtain identity documentation that allows them to live and work without facing the high levels of discrimination otherwise experienced by Rohingya in their day-to-day life. Typically, Rohingya in Yangon are registered as ‘Burmese Muslims’ or ‘Bamar Muslims’. A person willing to record their ethnic group as a Burmese/Bamar Muslim is generally able to access either full, associate or naturalised citizenship (depending on their family history, see Documentation), including national identity cards and residency documents which provide a legal right to a passport. Local sources reported that Rohingya can also pay bribes to officials to obtain a Kaman identity card. University students without CSCs (see National Identity Cards), including Rohingya and some religious minorities, are permitted to attend classes and sit examinations, but are unable to graduate and receive qualifications.

3.37 DFAT assesses that Rohingya who live outside of Rakhine State experience moderate levels of societal and official discrimination on a day-to-day basis. While they are officially denied citizenship rights, Rohingya who choose to identify as Kaman or other Muslim groups face a similar level of discrimination to that experienced by other Muslims (see Muslims).

Chin

3.38 Chin comprise around three percent of the national population. While ‘Chin’ is a recognised ethnic group, Chin people are ethnically and linguistically diverse, with at least six primary Chin tribal groups. The majority of Chin are practicing Christians.

3.39 In June 2018, UNHCR announced its decision to end the refugee status of Chin refugees from Myanmar residing in Malaysia and India. UNHCR stated the decision had been informed by political, social and security analyses of Chin State over several years, and concluded that Chin State is stable and secure for the purposes of refugee protection. Since 1 August 2018, Chin refugees have been given the option of extending their existing UNHCR identity card (without interview), which provides them UNHCR protection until 31 December 2019. Alternatively, refugees have been able to request an assessment if their protection needs stand, with a decision delivered within approximately two months. Based on the assessment decision, refugee status would be either confirmed (and the identity card renewed), or automatically terminated. From 1 January 2020, only individuals UNHCR confirms are still in need of international protection will remain registered.

3.40 UNHCR’s decision has been met with resistance by refugee and Chin rights groups, who have questioned the assessment of the stability and security of Chin State. In September 2018, the Chin Human Rights Organisation reported that their primary concerns related to restrictions on religious freedom (see Christians), ongoing human rights abuse associated with conflict in ceasefire areas by state and non-state actors (see Security Situation), and the lack of observance of safeguards for land, resources and communities in development activities. In February 2019, UNHCR reported escalating violence and a deteriorating security situation in southern Chin State, which had led to both internal displacement and departures to Bangladesh (see Exit and Entry Procedures).

3.41 Chin living both in and outside of Chin State reported incidents of discrimination in accessing rights and services. Chin in Chin State reported routine bribery for any engagement with local officials (usually Buddhist), including police, the GAD and Ministries of Forestrys and Agriculture. The Chin indigenous judicial system is used to settle disputes, but anecdotal evidence suggests that access typically requires bribes to be paid to court officials and judges. Chin also reported instances of mistreatment in public hospitals in Yangon, including medical staff refusing to treat Chin patients. Chin in and outside of Chin State described problems accessing identity documentation. In Chin State, Chin have been pressured by officials to record their religion as Buddhist, and experienced delays in receiving identity cards. Anecdotal evidence suggests many Chin in Yangon are not recorded on household lists, as local authorities typically request expensive bribes to update household lists.

3.42 DFAT assesses that Chin in Myanmar face a low risk of official discrimination on the basis of their ethnicity. Chin living in southern Chin State, including Paletwa and Matupi Townships, face a moderate risk of forced displacement or violence due to both outbreaks of conflict and development projects.

Karen

3.43 The Karen make up seven per cent of Myanmar’s population, and comprise a number of ethnic groups with Tibetan-Central Asian origins who speak 12 related languages. The majority of Karen are Buddhists, although large numbers converted to Christianity during British rule and Christians are estimated at around 30 per cent of the Karen population. Karen primarily reside in the eastern border region of the country, particularly Karen State, Tenasserim Division, eastern Pegu Division, Mon State and the Irrawaddy Division.

3.44 Parts of northern and southern Karen State are primarily controlled by EAOs (the KNU and NMSP respectively). Conflict between the Tatmadaw, the KNU and other EAOs since 1984 has led to thousands of Karen seeking protection in Thailand, but some Karen have returned to Myanmar since 2017 through an UNHCR-managed voluntary repatriation program (see Conditions for Returnees).

3.45 The Karen living in Karen State can generally access services, though this is restricted during periods of active conflict (see Security Situation). Basic services, including health and justice, are provided through parallel structures of government and non-state actors, however there has been greater cooperation in some sectors. For example, education was previously provided by the Karen Education and Cultural Department, the KNU and the KNLA, but in recent years some KNU community schools have been brought under the Ministry of Education system. In Karen State, both the KNU and Myanmar government land governance systems are used, and this complexity increases local community vulnerability to land confiscations. Major infrastructure development projects supported by both the government and the KNU, including road construction and hydropower dams, have the potential to increase land tenure insecurity and community displacement in Karen State. The Karen Women’s Organisation, a community-based organisation, has an officially mandated role in the KNU structure at different administrative levels and delivers services for women.

3.46 DFAT assesses that Karen in Myanmar face a low risk of official and societal discrimination on the basis of their ethnicity. Karen living in Karen State face a low risk of forced displacement or violence due to both outbreaks of conflict and development projects.

RELIGION

3.47 Section 34 of Myanmar’s Constitution entitles all Myanmar citizens to ‘freedom of conscience and the right to freely profess and practice religion subject to public order, morality or health’. Section 361 of the Constitution ‘recognises the special position of Buddhism’ as the faith professed by the majority of citizens; this applies only to Theravada Buddhism. The government bans any organisation of Buddhist monks from outside the nine monastic orders recognised under the Law Concerning Sangha Organisations (1990). Section 362 of the Constitution further recognises Christianity, Islam, Hinduism and animism as ‘the religions existing in the Union at the day of the coming into operation of this Constitution’. There are several other provisions in the Constitution that prohibit discrimination against citizens on the basis of religion, including section 352 which bans discrimination in the employment of public officials.

3.48 There are four laws known as the ‘protection of race and religion laws’, which concern interfaith marriage, religious conversion, monogamy and population control. These were originally proposed by the Committee Protection of Nationality and Religion (an organisation led by nationalist Buddhist monks, commonly known as Ma Ba Tha), and passed by government in 2015. The Buddhist Women Special Marriage Law (2015) requires the notification and registration of marriages between non-Buddhist men and Buddhist women, and penalties for non-compliance. The Religious Conversion Law (2015) allows conversion through an extensive application and approval process. The Population Control Law (2015) designates special zones in which population control measures can be applied, including authorising local authorities to implement three-year birth spacing. The Monogamy Law (2015) bans polygamy, which was already criminalised under the Penal Code (1861). The UN Special Rapporteur for human rights in Myanmar has criticised the laws for undermining the rights of women, children and religious minorities, particularly Muslims (see Muslims). The laws remain in force.

Christians

3.49 Approximately six percent of Myanmar’s population are Christians, primarily Baptists, Roman Catholics, and Anglicans, along with several small Protestant denominations. Christianity is the dominant religion of the Chin, Kachin and Naga ethnic groups, and is practiced widely amongst the Karen and Karenni ethnic groups. There are several Christian theological seminaries and Bible schools across the country. Major Christian festivals, including Christmas and Easter, are national holidays and are observed in most parts of Myanmar. Christians are rarely promoted to senior levels in the government, military or police, however second Vice President Henry Van Thio is a Chin Christian.

3.50 There are credible reports of local authorities blocking the ownership of land for Christian worship, leading Christians to worship in illegal house churches. In 2017 in Mandalay, Christians reported that the local GAD office required them to attest prayer activities would not be undertaken in a requested new place of worship. Christians also reported that the local GAD office had advised that permits for new religious buildings were suspended due to incidents in Yangon related to “illegal mosques and prayer activities leading to social unrest.” Christian communities in Chin and Kachin States reported significant delays (some spanning several years) to or the loss of applications to local authorities for property registration, construction, and renovation. There were reports of restrictions on other religious activities, including Sunday school and funeral processions.

3.51 Christians reported threats, intimidation and mob violence from local communities in 2017 and 2018. On some occasions, this was reportedly supported by local authorities and Buddhist monks. Community violence was more prevalent where Buddhists and Christians live in close proximity, including parts of Sagaing Region, Magway Region and Rakhine State. In July 2017, 150 Buddhists, including monks, reportedly attacked a group of newly converted Christians in Sagaing Region, injuring seven and damaging property. Local police, monks and villages reportedly attempted to stop the attacks. International media reported that several Christian clergy members were detained by the UWSA in September 2018. Those held were reportedly questioned regarding their religious practices to determine if they were proselytising. The UWSA had issued a statement a few weeks prior which stated that all churches, missionaries, school teachers, and clergy members must be investigated and that a list of all churches in Wa-controlled areas must be developed. The statement also banned the teaching of religious lessons or beliefs at government schools.

3.52 Christian communities in ethnic border areas, including Chin and Kachin States and the Naga Self-Administered Zone, have reported cases of conversion to Buddhism in the Tatmadaw-run Border Areas National Races Youth Development Training Schools, more commonly known as Na Ta La schools. According to Ministry of Border Affairs statistics, there were 33 Na Ta La schools in 2016, the majority in Chin State. Since 1994, the schools have reportedly provided free education and boarding to children of poor families in border areas, and students must learn Buddhist worship, culture and literature. Christian students in Na Ta La schools are not permitted to attend church, and access to families is restricted. Students are guaranteed government employment upon graduation, on the condition that they officially convert to Buddhism, including on their national identity cards.

3.53 DFAT assesses that Christians in Myanmar face a moderate risk of societal and official discrimination, and a low risk of violence on the basis of their religion.

Hindus

3.54 Hindus are a minority religious group, comprising only 0.5 per cent of the national population. According to 2014 census data, Hindus resided in almost all regions with the highest population in Bago. There are also populations concentrated in Yangon and Mandalay.

3.55 The Hindu community is reported to lack both political representation and economic opportunity, commonly working in the lowest paid jobs. Anecdotal evidence suggests that Hindus are prevented from advancing into senior positions of government, due to societal discrimination. Local sources described accounts of people of South Asian appearance, including Hindus, experiencing discrimination in the issuance of identity documents. Like other minorities, Hindus reported difficulties accessing NRCs, including delays and extensive administrative processes not applied to the majority of the population. Hindus also reported requests to change their ethnicity in the application.

3.56 Hindus are reported to be granted the most freedom of religion of Myanmar’s religious minority groups, however a small number of incidents of authorities restricting Hindu practice were reported in recent years. According to the US Department of State, a Hindu group in Mandalay reported delays in the issuance of a permit for a new religious building from the GAD, who advised permits had been suspended.

3.57 Hindu also experienced the violence of the August 2017 ARSA attacks and subsequent security operations in Rakhine State. In May 2018, Amnesty International attributed the massacre of up to 53 Hindus and the disappearance of 46 others in August 2017 in northern Maungdaw, Rakhine State, to ARSA. Prior to Amnesty International’s report, the government had also blamed ARSA for these deaths, and many international observers acknowledged that ARSA had committed atrocities during the August 2017 violence. ARSA denies involvement in the killings, and the UN Fact-Finding Mission was unable to verify the details of this event. The UN Fact-Finding Mission also documented some cases of Hindus perpetrating violence, including in Buthidaung Township. 1,200 Hindus were reported to be internally displaced in Maungdaw and Sittwe, and in September 2017, the government announced it would build new villages for some Hindu communities displaced by the August 2017 violence. Smaller numbers fled to Bangladesh, and the Government of Bangladesh estimated 500 refugees from Myanmar in Bangladesh as at December 2017 were Hindu. 508 Hindus were amongst the first group of returnees proposed for repatriation to Myanmar in January 2018, but the repatriation did not proceed. As at the time of publication, no Hindus had been formally repatriated from Bangladesh, though DFAT is aware of reports of a small number of Hindus returning to Myanmar informally.

3.58 The All Myanmar Hindu Central Council, an umbrella organisation of Hindu groups across the country issued a statement in September 2017 which rejected the term ‘Rohingya Hindu’ used in some international reporting on the violence in Rakhine State. The statement said that this term did not exist in the history of Hindus in Myanmar, and that Hindus prefer not to be described using this term. Anecdotal evidence suggests that following the August 2017 violence, more Hindus are now wearing tilaka, a red facial marking practiced in Hinduism, to avoid being mistaken for Muslims.

3.59 DFAT assesses Hindus in Myanmar face a low risk of official and societal discrimination, and a low risk of violence on a day-to-day basis, on the basis of their religious identity or perceived association with the Rohingya.

Muslims

3.60 There are several distinct Muslim communities living throughout Myanmar, with different cultural and ethnic backgrounds. At the time of the 2014 census, Muslims made up approximately four per cent of the population, and the majority lived in northern Rakhine State. However the Muslim population has decreased following the mass movement of Rohingya to Bangladesh in 2017 (see Rakhine State, Security Situation and Rohingya). Most Muslims in Myanmar are of the Sunni sect, and Islam is practiced widely around the country including in Yangon, Irrawaddy, Magwe, and Mandalay Divisions by some Bamar and ethnic Indians as well as ethnic Kaman and Rohingya. Aside from the Rohingya, most Muslims speak Burmese or the dominant local dialect in their place of residence, and/or their language of origin. In Karen State, for example, many Muslims have integrated into Karen communities, speak Karen language, and sometimes refer to themselves as ‘Black Karen’.

3.61 Muslims are underrepresented in the public sector; there are no Muslim members of parliament, and Muslims have been excluded from a range of government jobs, including as public school teachers and health personnel. Businesses owned by Muslims have reported issues in procuring government contracts without a Buddhist interlocutor.

3.62 Muslims experience a range of limitations on their ability to practice their faith freely. In recent years, authorities have blocked the rebuilding of mosques and madrassas that have been either damaged, destroyed or sealed. Requests for new religious buildings were delayed, and even when approved some decisions were reversed. Under the ‘Preservation of Race and Religion Laws’, a Muslim man is not allowed to marry outside of the religion, however Muslim women can with community permission.

3.63 Muslims have also been denied access to basic rights and services. The Burma Human Rights Network documented multiple incidents of Muslims of all ethnicities being refused NRCs. Reasons varied, ranging from the Muslim applicant being unable to provide extensive and often difficult to obtain documentation to prove family lineage before 1824, and the refusal of immigration authorities to register a Muslim person as Bamar, the majority ethnicity. Some have been required to choose a “foreign” ethnicity to self-identify as Muslim on applications for citizenship cards. Some Muslims have also reported an unwillingness to engage with the justice system when needed, due to a perceived discrimination on the basis of their religion, and a preference to resolve matters informally.

3.64 Anti-Muslim sentiment is prevalent in Myanmar, especially outside of major cities, and is circulated through social media, some state institutions and mainstream news websites. A prominent Buddhist nationalist monk, Ashin Wirathu, has led an anti-Muslim campaign since the 2012 violence in Rakhine State. Myanmar’s highest Buddhist authority, the State Sangha Maha Nayaka Committee (or Ma Ha Na), imposed a one year preaching ban from March 2017 on Wirathu for spreading hate speech with the potential to incite violence. During the ban, Wirathu continued to post online videos and comments on social media, although Facebook removed his account in February 2018 for “consistently sharing content promoting hate”. Wirathu was a leading member of the Ma Ba Tha. In May 2017, the Ma Ha Na also imposed a ban on Ma Ba Tha activities, and the group were ordered to disband and remove its anti-Muslim propaganda from across the country. In response to the ban, the group rebranded as the Buddha Dhamma Parahita Foundation. In July 2018, the Ma Ha Na again ordered the group to cease its activities. DFAT is not aware of any recent activities of the group.

Non-Rohingya Muslims in Rakhine State

3.65 The Kaman are the second largest Muslim group in Rakhine State, after the Rohingya. The 2014 census recorded 28,700 Muslims in Rakhine State, which are likely mostly Kaman as the Rohingya were not counted. The Kaman primarily live in central Rakhine State, and are the only Muslim group to be recognised as one of Myanmar’s 135 ethnic groups. This means that Kaman can theoretically access the basic services unavailable to the Rohingya population. However in practice, despite their distinct identity, Kaman in Rakhine State are subject to official and societal discrimination on the basis of their perceived association with the Rohingya, or because of broader anti-Muslim sentiment. Key areas of discrimination include access to public services, employment opportunities and official identity documentation. In various parts of Rakhine State, ethnic Rakhine have also declared ‘no Muslim’ zones where Muslims are not permitted to enter.

3.66 Kaman experienced violence perpetrated by security forces, ethnic Rakhine and anti-Muslim groups (see Security Situation, Rakhine State) in 2012, and the 2013 violence in Thandwe, Rakhine State, specifically targeted the Kaman community. The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported increased discrimination and marginalisation against the Kaman on the basis of their Muslim identity, in Rakhine State following the 2012 violence. Many Kaman in central Rakhine are still displaced, prevented from returning to their places of origin and instead segregated with Rohingya in IDP camps and displacement sites without freedom of movement and access to livelihoods, education and health services. Given the 2017 violence was concentrated in northern Rakhine and most Kaman live in central Rakhine, DFAT expects that the Kaman did not experience the same level of violence as the Rohingya, however DFAT is unable to verify this. Following the 2017 violence, Kaman in central Rakhine experienced an increase in hostility directed toward Muslims from Rakhine communities.

3.67 Movement of non-displaced Kaman is also tightly controlled by the security forces, local authorities and communities. The Kaman (and Rohingya) require a temporary travel permit for all travel between townships in Rakhine State, per a 1997 directive by the Rakhine State Immigration and National Registration Department that is applied to all “Bengali races”. Other than the travel permit, most restrictions on freedom of movement are not formally defined, but are monitored informally by communities. Muslims (Rohingya and Kaman) are not permitted to travel to Sittwe town or other major towns in central Rakhine, except in exceptional circumstances, such as medical emergencies (the same process as for Rohingya, see Rohingya). Muslims are also prevented from entering many Rakhine villages in central Rakhine State. Kaman who attempt to travel in central Rakhine beyond locally accepted boundaries, are reportedly arrested and subjected to ill-treatment. The US Department of State reported that individuals stereotyped as appearing Muslim by security forces face additional scrutiny of movements within Rakhine State, regardless of their actual religion.

3.68 Access to tertiary education is very limited for Muslim students in Rakhine State, who are not permitted to travel outside the state to attend university. As at February 2018, only eight Muslim (presumably Kaman) students were enrolled in Sittwe University, central Rakhine State, but communal tensions and the security situation meant Muslim students could not physically attend the university.

3.69 DFAT assesses that Kaman in Rakhine State face high levels of official and societal discrimination and a moderate risk of violence, on the basis of their religion and perceived association with the Rohingya.

Muslims outside Rakhine State

3.70 According to the 2014 census (which excluded the Rohingya), the largest Muslim populations are in Yangon and Mandalay regions and Mon State. In 2014, there were 345,612 Muslims in Yangon Region (comprising 4.7 percent of the population), 187,785 in Mandalay Region (three percent) and 119,086 in Mon State (5.8 percent).

3.71 Muslims outside of Rakhine State can generally access a similar level of government services to other religious minorities, however local sources told DFAT that Muslims in Yangon and Mandalay often experience delays and are required to pay informal fees for routine government processes, such as updating household lists (see Household Registration Lists). As the periods of time and payments vary depending on the individual applicant and township officer processing requests, DFAT assesses that these incidents generally represent informal discrimination by mostly Bamar Buddhist public officials, rather than formal policy. Like the Rohingya outside of Rakhine State, other Muslim university students without CSCs (see National Identity Cards) are only permitted to attend classes and sit examinations, and are unable to graduate or receive qualifications.

3.72 Muslims in Yangon have described increasing restrictions on their ability to practice their faith in recent years. Public events marking Islamic days were cancelled by authorities in Yangon (and Bago, Bago Region) in 2017, due to pressure from Buddhist nationalist groups. In April 2017, authorities closed two madrassas that educated several hundred primary school students in Thaketa Township, Yangon. The closure was in response to protests by a group of up to 100 Buddhist nationalists who claimed the schools were illegally operating as mosques. At the time of publication, the madrassas remained closed. In June 2018, a large community prayer in Thaketa was banned by authorities, and police charged the Muslim prayer leader and two other community members with failure to obtain a permit to organise prayers, punishable by a fine or up to six months in prison. Some Muslims restrict their religious practices for fear of discrimination. Muslims in Yangon described to DFAT their decision to practice a less conservative form of Islam, including changing their dress and beards, to avoid visibly demonstrating elements of Bangladeshi or Indian Islam.

3.73 The reduced tolerance for Islamic faith activities has been, at least in part, propagated by a rise in anti-Muslim sentiment at both the official and societal level. In its most extreme form, this has resulted in violent incidents against the Muslim community. In May 2018, local media reported that nationalist monks raised concerns with police of Rohingya hiding illegally in Mingala Taungnyunt Township, Yangon. The reports stated that when police investigations found no one to be living illegally in the neighbourhood, monks and Buddhist community members violently attacked the Muslim community, injuring at least two people. Police arrested eight individuals for their involvement. Several credible sources described a case in January 2018 of a young man being harassed and beaten in the street by plain clothed police in Yangon reportedly because of his Muslim appearance.

3.74 While Muslims outside of Rakhine State generally have greater freedom to travel, they continue to face restrictions on travel into and out of Rakhine State. Muslims are also not permitted to enter some villages designated by communities as ‘Muslim-free zones’. The Burma Human Rights Network documented at least 21 Buddhist villages across Myanmar from 2012 to 2017 whereby villagers, with support from local authorities, had erected signposts warning Muslims against entering the village. In September 2017, authorities in Karen State issued an order requiring all Muslims in the state to report planned travel. While the Karen State Chief Minister later described the order as an “administrative error”, travel restrictions reportedly remained in place for months. In March 2018, the government’s decision to resettle 55 Kaman households from displacement camps in Rakhine State to Yangon was publically opposed by a USDP MP, who likened the Kaman to ‘a spreading cancer’. The proposal was voted down in the lower house of parliament, 236 to 136 votes on the basis that the Kaman are citizens who hold NRCs that allow them to move freely within Myanmar.

3.75 DFAT assesses that Muslims outside of Rakhine state face moderate levels of official and societal discrimination and a low risk of societal violence on a day-to-day basis, on the basis of their religion.

POLITICAL OPINION (ACTUAL OR IMPUTED)

3.76 Restrictions on freedom of speech and political commentary were lifted after a civilian government was established in 2011. Many former political prisoners and exiled activists are now politically active; around 115 NLD MPs elected in 2015 are former political prisoners. The government has a policy to release all political prisoners, and has pardoned scores of political prisoners since assuming power in 2016. According to the Assistance Association for Political Prisoners, as at October 2018, 27 convicted political prisoners were in detention. A further 262 people were facing trial for charges related to political activity.

3.77 The government generally accepts peaceful political dissent, but some laws restricting political activism remain and protesters continue to be arrested. The Peaceful Assembly and Peaceful Procession Law (2011) governs citizens’ rights to protest. In 2014, the law was amended to reduce some penalties, and again in 2016 to remove the requirement to seek permission to protest and change it to a process of 48 hours notification before a planned protest. Despite public criticism, amendments to the law passed the upper house in March 2018. This included the creation of a new offence of providing support to a protest with ‘the intention to break national security, rule of law, public order or public morals’, punishable by up to two years imprisonment or a potentially unlimited fine. These represented a significant regression from progress to date on freedom of assembly. Protesters were arrested and charged under the Peaceful Assembly and Peaceful Procession Law as recently as May 2018, when nine human rights defenders were charged for organising multi-city protests calling for civilian protection and an end to the conflict in Kachin State. In December 2018, three ethnic Kachin activists were each sentenced to six months imprisonment and fines of MMK 500,000 (approximately AUD 460) for defamation under Section 500 of the Myanmar Penal Code, after participating in demonstrations in Kachin State about the ongoing conflict.

3.78 DFAT is aware of recent peaceful protests, including about the conflicts in Kachin and northern Shan States, being closed down, disrupted by thugs, or relocated to the outskirts of Yangon. In 2017, the Ministry of Home Affairs issued a ban against protests being held in downtown Yangon; the directive remains in place.
Despite this ban, Buddhist monk Wirathu was permitted to lead a march in downtown Yangon in October 2018 condemning the international community's involvement in domestic affairs, and supporting the Tatmadaw. Protests that proceed face strict conditions, including the provision of advance notice to authorities of slogans, flags, signs or banners that will be used. Violations are punishable through minor fines and up to three months imprisonment. In January 2018, a series of demonstrations were held by students on university campuses demanding an increase to the education budget. Up to 56 students from universities around Myanmar were reportedly expelled.

3.79 State surveillance and laws regarding online speech constrain open political discussion (see Media). Activists DFAT spoke with in Myanmar indicated a willingness to openly discuss some political issues (such as the situation of the Rohingya), but a strong reluctance to voice dissenting views about the government (civilian or military). A low level of societal intolerance towards differing political opinions exists. For example, laws allowing for greater freedom of speech have led to an increase in hate speech, which has incited discrimination and violence, particularly against the Rohingya and other minority groups. The UN Special Rapporteur on Human Rights noted in March 2018 that hate speech, particularly on social media, is stifling sensitive and unpopular opinions.

3.80 DFAT assesses that in the course of normal events, Myanmar citizens face a low risk of official or societal harassment, discrimination, violence or imprisonment on the basis of their actual or imputed political opinion. People who organise or actively participate in public protests against the government or the Tatmadaw face a moderate risk of being arrested and detained.

GROUPS OF INTEREST

Human Rights Organisations

3.81 The Constitution provides for freedom of association and various laws allow citizens to form associations, however the government imposes restrictions on some organisations. The Association Registration Law (2014) provides a voluntary registration procedure for local and international NGOs without restrictions or criminal punishments for non-compliance. In practice, many organisations choose not to register, both because the process is onerous, and registration would bring organisations under the purview of the Ministry of Home Affairs.

3.82 The US Department of State reported that in 2017 civil society groups and community based organisations were able to operate openly, including in discussing human rights and political issues, but with state surveillance. Local sources reported regular police surveillance and recording of local NGO events in 2017. Civil society organisations working in Kachin and Shan States are monitored more closely and are routinely visited by security forces. The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported increased security concerns when these organisations release reports incriminating the Tatmadaw. In 2018, international organisations working in Kachin State were required to undertake complex approval processes for access from union and state level authorities, which created lengthy delays in assisting communities.

3.83 Local sources described a shrinking democratic space for civil society. In March 2018, the parliament considered the draft International Non-Government Organisation Law, aimed at regulating both local and international NGOs operating in Myanmar. If passed, the law would allow the government to monitor NGOs at the central and state level, and suspend and terminate NGO activities. It also empowers the government to compel citizens employed by international NGOs to report on the activities of their organisations.
3.84 Restrictions are also placed on individual rights advocates and activists. Human rights activists and advocates, including representatives from international NGOs, are routinely issued short-term visas that require periodic departure from Myanmar in order to be renewed. Freedom House reported incidents of individual activists being monitored by the Ministry of Home Affairs in 2017. Myanmar staff working for international NGOs are also closely monitored, and some senior staff of NGOs who work in support of the Rohingya reported receiving death threats from Buddhist nationalists.

3.85 Advocates working on other sensitive issues, including land and the environment, risk harassment, arrest and violence. The US Department of State reported arrests of groups of farmers (and their supporters) who were demanding the return of land recently seized by authorities and private sector organisations, and previously seized by the military under the former government. The UN Special Rapporteur on Human Rights reported incidents of villagers in Karen State facing threats to personal safety by quarry operators, following community concern over the impacts of the new quarry at Mount Lun Nya on their livelihoods and the environment. In late 2017, Htay Aung, an activist who challenged illegal land grabs in northern Shan State, was beaten to death by around 20 villagers while visiting disputed territory on the invitation of local officials. At the time of publication, those responsible had not been held to account.

3.86 In January 2017, Ko Ni, a prominent Muslim lawyer, democracy advocate, and advisor to the NLD, was assassinated at Yangon airport, in what was considered a warning to democracy and rights activists. In February 2019, the assassin Kyi Lin and his co-conspirator Aung Win Zaw were sentenced to death for Ko Ni’s murder. Another co-conspirator, Zeya Phyo, received a five-year jail sentence for falsifying evidence. The fourth defendant, Aung Win Tun, was sentenced to three years for harbouring a suspect. The lengthy trial was widely criticised, including due to the court’s failure to hear key witnesses that could point to Tatmadaw involvement, suspected Tatmadaw involvement in the police investigation, and the incorrect identification of a deceased individual as a suspect. Moreover, the whereabouts of former Tatmadaw officer and suspected mastermind, Aung Win Khine, remains unknown.

Media

3.87 Myanmar’s Constitution provides for freedom of expression, and media freedom has improved since official government censorship and pre-publication approval ceased in 2012. The number of news outlets in Myanmar has increased significantly since the licensing of media outlets opened up in 2013. The news market is highly competitive, but this is generally due to a lack of profitability, rather than any government-imposed restrictions. However, under the Printers and Publishers Registration Law (2014) the authorities are able to withhold licenses to outlets whose reporting is considered harmful to national security or religion. Myanmar is ranked 137th out of 180 countries in the Reporters Without Borders 2018 World Press Freedom Index, a drop in six places since 2017. Similarly, Freedom House assesses Myanmar’s media sector as ‘Not Free’.

3.88 Local sources told DFAT that the biggest constraints facing journalists in Myanmar are access to information and self-censorship. Access to official information is tightly controlled in Myanmar. The government has appointed a specific spokesperson for each ministry, but they are often not fully informed or able to provide information when requested. Media access to northern Rakhine State was heavily restricted by the government following the August 2017 violence, on the basis of insecurity, and instead eight state-run media visits to northern Rakhine State were provided to the international community from August 2017 to February 2018. Self-censorship is practiced, including when reporting on the Tatmadaw or military-controlled government portfolios such as the Ministry of Home Affairs, Ministry of Border Affairs and Ministry of Defence, and on other topics deemed sensitive, including Rakhine State, the peace process and Buddhist extremism.
Surveillance of journalists by the Home Affairs Ministry remains common, and journalists who do report on sensitive issues risk surveillance, harassment and imprisonment. Associated Press local journalist, Esther Htusan, left Myanmar in late 2017 following death threats issued in response to her critical reporting on various sensitive topics, including Tatmadaw operations in Rakhine and Kachin States. At the time of publication, she remained out of the country.

Local sources reported a notable decline in the operating environment for media workers in recent years, including due to the increased use of a number of anti-press laws and other laws against journalists since 2016. In 2017, 20 journalists were prosecuted, mostly under the Section 66(d) of the Telecommunications Law (2013) in cases of online defamation. The parliament amended the law in 2017 to reduce the maximum prison sentence from three years to two. However key restrictive elements remain, including the requirement for the Ministry of Transport and Communications to provide permission to file charges under the law. Observers have noted an increased use of the law under the civilian government, and from other parties including politicians, Tatmadaw officers and Buddhist monks, to suppress criticism online from both journalists and social media users.

In June 2017, three journalists covering an event hosted by the TNLA were arrested in Shan State under the Unlawful Associations Act (1908). The journalists were reportedly held incommunicado in a secret location for two days. They could face up to three years imprisonment if convicted, but at the time of publication, the case had not concluded. The arrest demonstrates that the provision in the News Media Law (2014) that exempts journalists from detention while covering conflicts is not being upheld by authorities. Credible sources reported that this case redefined the boundaries of acceptable behaviour for journalists, and has contributed to an increasingly opaque operating environment. According to Amnesty International, the Unlawful Associations Act is used most frequently in ethnic and religious minority areas.

The most high profile case against Myanmar journalists in recent years involved two Reuters journalists, who were convicted in September 2018 under the Official Secrets Act (1923) and sentenced to seven years imprisonment for their investigation of a massacre in Inn Din, northern Rakhine State, in late 2017 (see Rohingya, Violence and Extrajudicial Killings). In November 2018, Reuters lodged an appeal against the convictions, based on the prosecution’s failure to prove necessary elements under the Official Secrets Act, the failure of the court to recognise compelling evidence of a police set-up, and serious due process violations. The case drew international condemnation, and was widely considered to represent a regression for democracy and rule of law in Myanmar.

Foreign journalists report difficulties in receiving government approval of visas, and local sources told DFAT that there were fewer English language reporters operating in Myanmar compared to recent years. Some news outlets which publish in both Burmese and English are more conservative in their Burmese publications, particularly when covering Rakhine State.

Internet access was previously limited by official restrictions and poor telecommunications infrastructure. Social media use, especially Facebook, is now rapidly increasing in Myanmar. Credible sources reported increased polarisation between international media and social media reporting, which worsened follow the August 2017 violence in Rakhine State. The Tatmadaw and Ma Ba Tha have used Facebook to stir anti-Muslim sentiment (see Muslims and Military).

Overall, DFAT assesses that journalists in Myanmar who report on sensitive issues, including the government and the Tatmadaw, face a moderate risk of being prosecuted through the judicial system and receiving sentences that could be considered high by international standards. DFAT assesses that, in general, journalists face a low risk of physical violence as a result of their reporting.
Women

3.96 Article 348 of the Constitution prohibits state discrimination against any Myanmar citizen based on their sex. Cultural and societal norms define politics and business as the realm of men, and women as mothers who are not active in the formal sector of the economy. While women do work in government, business and civil society, they are underrepresented in senior positions in both the public and private sectors. With the notable exception of Aung San Suu Kyi, few have gained ministerial appointments. While the 2015 elections saw an unprecedented number of women elected to Myanmar’s parliament (64 of 491 elected representatives), women currently constitute just over 10 per cent of parliamentarians. Men earn around 25 per cent more than women, and there are barriers to women accessing finance and land use rights.

3.97 Under the Penal Code, rape is illegal in Myanmar. Marital rape is legal except where the wife is under 14 years of age (the legal age for female marriage). There is no specific legislation outlawing spousal abuse or domestic violence. Abortion is illegal, including for a rape-induced pregnancy. A new law on gender-based violence (GBV) has been under development since 2012, but there is reportedly some resistance from within the civil service, judiciary and parliamentarians. The draft law is intended to protect women from all forms of violence, including domestic violence, marital rape, sexual violence, harassment in the workplace and public spaces, and violence through customary practice. It will also provide survivors of violence with more effective legal and health services. The draft law reportedly would allow women to abort rape-induced pregnancies, albeit subject to the agreement of a (currently all male) health committee. The draft law is reported to carry a life sentence for the rape of girls under the age of 18 and disabled women, and up to five years imprisonment for those found guilty of marital rape. At the time of publication, the bill had not yet been passed.

3.98 While reliable national data on the prevalence of violence against women is unavailable, reports confirm violence in all its forms is perpetrated against women and girls. Local sources reported this is higher in communities affected by conflict or disaster. Media outlets regularly report stories of physical and sexual abuse of women, often involving underage victims as young as six years old, with the perpetrators of violence usually members of the victim’s family or local village. According to the UN Fact-Finding Mission, there are also reports of military officials and EAOs committing rape and other acts of sexual violence in Kachin, Shan and Rakhine States. Authorities often do not investigate these crimes (see Rohingya, Violence).

3.99 Local sources told DFAT that women rarely seek justice for violence, including rape, through formal legal mechanisms. Under the current legislation, women need to provide medical records to pursue a rape case, but the lack of doctors in rural areas and the requirement to go to the police before undergoing a medical examination make successful prosecution difficult. Credible sources described women’s general lack of trust of security forces in Myanmar. Many police stations nationwide do not have officers trained to appropriately deal with GBV cases. There have been recent incidents of the police sharing details of GBV victims on their Facebook pages; while this is common practice for other crimes in Myanmar, it demonstrates a lack of understanding of the sensitivity of gender-based crimes amongst the police force, and disregards the privacy of the victims. Women are even less likely to seek formal justice when violent crimes are perpetrated by authorities, in part due to impunity. The UN Fact-Finding Mission described a 2018 rape case in Shan State where the punishment of the soldier responsible was 10 slaps, and compensation of MMK 200,000 (approximately AUD 180) to a male family member of the victim. The Legal Clinic Myanmar provides free legal aid, mostly to women and children.

3.100 More often, redress for victims of GBV is sought through customary laws, particularly in Muslim communities. Customary processes often promote community harmony over the individual woman’s wellbeing, and typically involve the victim discussing the incident with other women and, if it is deemed sufficiently serious, with the men in the family. If the male family members agree that the incident was unacceptable, they then take it up with local leaders. In some communities, the solution often takes the form of an apology rather than a punishment; for example, an animal may be killed and used to feed the whole village. In Kachin State, village-based committees typically deal with disputes, which are usually resolved through mediation or compensation. In the case of a rape, the victim and her family are typically required to ‘cleanse’ the village, by holding a ceremony and feeding the whole village. Often GBV victims are returned to their families and provided inadequate support. According to the US Department of State, the government operates five centres for women and children victims of violent crime (including trafficking).

3.101 Health services in both rural and urban areas lack expertise in sexual and reproductive health. A UN assessment of sexual, reproductive, maternal, newborn and adolescent services in Myanmar in 2016 found that effective coverage was as low as 24 per cent nationally, with considerable disparities between state and regions, ranging from 48 per cent in Karen State to 9 per cent in Chin State. Access to contraception remains limited. While abortion is illegal, it is reportedly common, and contributes to Myanmar’s high maternal mortality rates. The reluctance of women to report crimes of sexual violence also prevents women receiving timely medical services, including to prevent pregnancy or HIV/AIDS.

3.102 In 2017, the government reportedly investigated 185 cases of trafficking, with most related to sex trafficking or the involuntarily domestic servitude of Myanmar women, including through forced marriages to Chinese men, primarily in Kachin State. There have been, however, credible reports that government officials have facilitated or profited from both sex and labor trafficking of women and girls, including by hindering law enforcement efforts against the perpetrators. In 2018, the US Department of State downgraded Myanmar to a Tier 3 (the lowest category) country in its Trafficking in Persons report, largely because of the government’s management of the Rohingya crisis. According to the report, many Rohingya who fled Rakhine State have been subjected to exploitation, or transported to other countries for sex trafficking following their displacement. The report identifies Rohingya women in the displacement camps in Bangladesh as being particularly vulnerable to trafficking within Bangladesh and to India. Local sources told DFAT that investigations into trafficking are typically inadequate, and there are limited opportunities for justice.

3.103 Rohingya women in Rakhine State face multiple levels of discrimination. In addition to the official and societal discrimination faced by Rohingya people in general (see Rohingya), Rohingya society is conservative and women often face familial or community-based restrictions on their movements and activities. Rohingya girls over the age of 13 are often prevented from leaving their homes until they are married. Violence against Rohingya women is reportedly highly prevalent, particularly intimate partner violence. Rohingya women in Rakhine State also face additional restrictions on their marital and reproductive rights. Local authorities prohibit Rohingya families from having more than two children, although this is inconsistently enforced. Local authorities also require Rohingya to obtain a marriage permit (not required for other ethnic minorities), which can take up to two years and bribes to process (see Rohingya). Other restrictions on Rohingya in Rakhine State.

3.104 Overall, DFAT assesses that women in Myanmar face moderate levels of societal discrimination, and Rohingya women in Rakhine State face high levels of official and societal discrimination on the basis of their gender. Women throughout Myanmar face a moderate risk of GBV, particularly domestic violence.

LGBTI

3.105 Article 377 of the Penal Code prohibits ‘carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman or animal’, with a punishment of a fine and up to ten years’ imprisonment. This is interpreted, inter alia, as criminalising sex between men; sex between two women is not considered to be covered under Article 377. There have been two prominent cases where authorities have used this provision against... members of the LGBTI community: a transgender person who was sentenced to five years imprisonment in 2011 (released after three years), and an unsuccessful attempt to prosecute a gay couple who held a civil ceremony in 2014. Authorities also use Article 377 to prosecute perpetrators of child sexual offences and same-sex rape (provisions in the Penal Code only discuss rape of a female victim by a male perpetrator), thus conflating homosexuality and paedophilia. There have been no recent prosecutions under Article 377, and local civil society representatives told DFAT that this provision is primarily used by the police to extort money, particularly from gay and transgender men.

3.106 There are credible and recent reports of police harassment, extortion, physical and sexual abuse of LGBTI people. Section 35 (c) of the Police Act (1945) and Section 30 (c) and (d) of the Rangoon Police Act (1902) (known as the ‘Shadow and Disguise Acts’) are also used to intimidate and arrest LGBTI individuals. These provisions allow the police to detain a person located on the street between sunset and sunrise, with a covered face or being otherwise disguised, and unable to give a satisfactory account of oneself. LGBTI people are increasingly being detained at patrol sites, rather than being taken to police stations, and forced to pay fines of around MMK 50,000 (approximately AUD 45) for release. As police officers are frequently the perpetrators of harassment, a victim’s ability to seek legal recourse is limited. When victims do file cases at police stations, officers are frequently uncooperative in gathering evidence and identifying perpetrators. Furthermore, the majority of documented cases cannot proceed to court due to an insufficient number of qualified lawyers being equipped and willing to advise in cases involving LGBTI individuals. A recent report from a LGBTI rights group identified 13 organisations and 15 lawyers around the country who provide legal aid to LGBTI people, mostly in or near the larger cities.

3.107 The LGBTI community has become increasingly visible in Myanmar in recent years, but societal discrimination persists, particularly in rural areas. Most Myanmar people hold conservative views about gender roles, and the open discussion of sex in Myanmar is considered taboo. Traditional Buddhist beliefs consider homosexuality a result of karma. In remote and rural areas, religious groups (Buddhist, Muslim and Christian) have a high level of influence, and perpetrate societal discrimination against LGBTI, particularly transgender individuals. Some LGBTI individuals relocate from rural areas to avoid social stigma, and to seek employment opportunities. Forced heterosexual marriage occurs, particularly involving gay and transgender men. LGBTI people can cohabit in major cities, with large numbers of LGBTI people living in Yangon and Mandalay. Some restaurants, hotels and other venues in these major cities openly identify as LGBTI friendly; however, these venues can face some resistance from more conservative parts of the community, including religious organisations.

3.108 Public violence by the community against LGBTI individuals is rare, however credible sources told DFAT that parents often use corporal punishment to ‘correct’ behaviour in young children that does not align with traditional gender roles or heterosexual norms. Some parents are also reported to support teachers to discriminate against their LGBTI children at school. In school, LGBTI individuals are bullied by both peers and teachers, and there are high rates of school drop-out in the LGBTI community. There are restrictions on dress for transgender men in some universities. However, some recent improvement in the education system has been made, including the development of sexual orientation and gender identity content for the school curriculum by LGBTI rights groups and the Ministry of Education in 2017.

3.109 LGBTI people, particularly transgender, have limited employment prospects, including in large cities. Gay men are not permitted to take up senior positions in the police force or Tatmadaw. Employment in the beauty and entertainment industries is generally socially accepted for gay men and transgender women, but is often seasonal and poorly paid. Outside of these industries, most transgender women are required to dress as men in their workplace. Transgender men often work in low-paid manual jobs, including as construction workers or rickshaw drivers. Research by LGBTI rights groups indicate that there are gay and lesbian individuals working in government and the private sector, but they choose not to disclose their sexual orientation in the workplace for fear of discrimination. Workplace discrimination as experienced by lesbians and transgender men is not as well-documented as that experienced by gay men and transgender women. However, LGBTI rights organisations report it is higher due to the double disadvantage of being biological female in a patriarchal society. For example, transgender men have reported being given heavy workloads in manual jobs, while receiving the lower wages of a woman.

3.110 LGBTI people, particularly transgender, routinely experience discrimination in accessing health services. LGBTI people typically prefer to seek medical treatment in clinics operated by NGOs, especially in rural areas, due to experiences of discrimination on the basis of their sexual orientation and gender identity in government hospitals, including compulsory HIV/AIDS testing of transgender patients. Some of these NGO clinics provide antiretroviral therapy to HIV/AIDS patients. There are no fertility services for LGBTI individuals, and hormone replacement therapy for transgender women is often self-administered using contraceptive pills due to a lack of endocrine specialists. Sexual reassignment surgery is permissible in Myanmar with a doctor’s recommendation; without this, a transgender individual could be charged under Section 312 of the Penal Code that relates to sterilisation by surgery. DFAT is aware of only one case, in 2005, of a transgender woman successfully changing her identity documentation following sexual reassignment surgery.

3.111 Media coverage of LGBTI issues is often negative, but visibility of LGBTI issues is increasing, particularly in urban centres. For example, in 2018 the fourth ‘&PROUD’ Yangon LGBTI film festival attracted around 5,000 people, after it was first held in 2014. Social media has helped to increased awareness of LGBTI issues, but has also been a medium for hate speech targeting the LGBTI community. There is an active LGBTI civil society in Myanmar; the Myanmar LGBTI Rights Network is a group of around 20 civil society organisations advocating for LGBTI rights. These groups have permission to operate from the government, but can be subject to threats and intimidation.

3.112 DFAT assesses that LGBTI people in Myanmar face a moderate risk of official and societal discrimination on a day-to-day basis. DFAT further assesses that LGBTI people in Myanmar face a low risk of violence due to their sexual orientation or gender identity.

Children

3.113 Myanmar’s Child Law (1993) defines a child as a person under the age of 16, which contravenes the Convention on the Rights of the Child to which Myanmar is a signatory. The law sets the minimum age of criminal responsibility at seven years, well below the 12 years considered acceptable under international law. DFAT understands these issues are under consideration in the draft Child Rights Law, which was under parliamentary review at the time of publication.

3.114 Myanmar is a source country for children subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking, both in Myanmar and abroad. While the government raised the minimum age for work in shops, establishments, and factories to 14 years in 2016, child labour remains prevalent. Poverty drives some parents to remove their children from school to contribute to household earnings. In cities, children commonly work as street vendors, refuse collectors, restaurant and teashop attendants, and domestic workers. In rural areas, children routinely work in family agricultural activities. Children are vulnerable to forced labour or sex trafficking (including through debt bondage) in teashops and other small business, in the agricultural and construction sectors, and through begging.

3.115 There are also recent accounts of the Tatmadaw and EAOs recruiting children as soldiers or in other support roles. The UN Country Task Force on Monitoring and Reporting (CTFMR), the official mechanism for monitoring and reporting grave violations against children, reported 15 complaints (unverified at the time of publication) of child soldier recruitment in 2017, including in Yangon and Mandalay. The US Department of State reported 13 cases of children working in support roles for the Tatmadaw and its affiliate militias, including cleaning, portering, and cooking. One of these cases was reported to involve more than 200 children. While the government released 49 child soldiers in 2017 under the 2012 joint plan of action between the government and the UN to end recruitment of child soldiers, children who flee military service or are demobilised outside of the official CTFMR process are at risk of arrest and imprisonment on charges of desertion while their cases are investigated by the Tatmadaw. Some EAOs abduct or recruit children, including from IDP camps, to fight against the Tatmadaw. EAOs known to recruit child soldiers include the KIA, Democratic Karen Benevolent Army, KNLA, KNLA Peace Council, Karenni Army, Shan State Army-South, and the UWSA. The Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief, and Resettlement, UNICEF, and civil society organisations provide reintegration services and support to discharged children.

3.116 For information on domestic violence against children, see Corporal Punishment. For information on violence against Rohingya children, see Rohingya. Violence.
4. COMPLEMENTARY PROTECTION CLAIMS

ARBITRARY DEPRIVATION OF LIFE

Extrajudicial Killings

4.1 Extrajudicial killings were reported across the country, concentrated in areas of active conflict. The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported extrajudicial killings in 2016 and 2017 in Kachin, Shan and Rakhine States. It described killings in the context of military operations, forced labour, the executions of persons in Tatmadaw custody (see Deaths in Custody), and targeted killings of individuals who share the ethnicity of EAOs. For example, in July 2018, six female TNLA medics were killed extrajudicially while in Tatmadaw custody, but the Tatmadaw has denied involvement. Extrajudicial killings by the Tatmadaw and BGP were widespread during the security operations in Rakhine State in August 2017. In Inn Din, Maungdaw Township, security forces were responsible for the extrajudicial killing of at least 10 Rohingya men. The Tatmadaw confirmed the killings following the discovery of a mass grave, but claimed the men were terrorists. Inn Din is one of at least five locations in northern Rakhine State where DFAT assesses there are credible reports of widespread civilian killings as part of the 2017 violence (see Rohingya, Violence).

4.2 There are credible reports of Tatmadaw soldiers intentionally killing individuals for trying to escape from or for refusing to participate in forced labour, or because they were physically unable to continue working. For example, in January 2017 in Muse Township, Shan State, two villagers were reportedly killed (one beaten, one shot) when they were no longer able to carry heavy materials in forced portering work. The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported several accounts of individuals, particularly men between 18-40 years, with the same ethnic background as EAOs being killed by the Tatmadaw. In March 2016 in Manton Township, Shan State, the Tatmadaw allegedly shot a Ta’ang man, who was suspected of being a member of the TNLA.

4.3 Extrajudicial killings were also reported in other parts of Myanmar. In April 2018, the Tatmadaw were reported to have fatally shot a Karen community leader and environmental activist, Saw O Moo, in Karen State while he was riding his motorbike with a KNLA soldier. The Tatmadaw denied any wrongdoing on the basis that the man was suspected of planting mines. Amnesty International also reported the killing of four ethnic Karenni men by Tatmadaw soldiers in December 2017 in Kayah State.

Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances

4.4 The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported multiple accounts of enforced disappearances by the Tatmadaw and the Myanmar Intelligence Office (commonly known as the Sa Ya Pa). Disappearances were reported to occur typically in the context of a lack of compliance with procedural safeguards for detention. This frequently resulted in family members being unaware of the whereabouts of their detained relatives until they escaped, were released, or transferred to official places of detention, which in some cases was weeks or months later. In other cases, individuals arrested by the Tatmadaw never returned and their families remain uninformed of their whereabouts. Two Kachin IDPs from Mansi Township were missing for over a month after reportedly being arrested by the Tatmadaw in January 2018, before their bodies were found buried in the jungle close to their village. The Tatmadaw reportedly refused permission for community leaders to search for the missing IDPs following their disappearance. The UN Fact-Finding Mission also received multiple accounts of cases where individuals were detained by the Tatmadaw and, after family members searched for them, were found dead, often buried, and sometimes with ropes binding their wrists.

4.5 Amnesty International and the UN Fact-Finding Mission reported multiple cases of enforced disappearances carried out by EAOs or insurgent groups, including as a means of coercion to participate in their operations, for collaborating with the Tatmadaw, or for otherwise opposing an EAO. According to Amnesty International, the enforced disappearances of ethnic Rakhine and Mro villagers in August 2017 in Rakhine State were attributed to ARSA. In October 2017 in Nankham Township, Shan State, the TNLA reportedly abducted the father of a young man who was absent when the TNLA attempted to recruit him, who was held until the man returned and was recruited. The KIA was also reported to have abducted civilians as a means to coerce participation in their operations, including abducting and holding hostage a 12 year old girl in Kutkai Township, Shan State, because her brother had resisted recruitment.

Deaths in Custody

4.6 The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported numerous killings of civilians and members of EAOs, both men and women, while in Tatmadaw custody. The pattern of behaviour typically involved the Tatmadaw detaining individuals, questioning them regarding their occupations and possible affiliations with EAOs, or the whereabouts of members or bases of EAOs (often using torture or ill-treatment), and the victims subsequently being killed. In January 2018, five men were reported to be fatally shot by Tatmadaw soldiers in Tanai Township, Kachin State, while detained by the Tatmadaw following clashes between the Tatmadaw and the KIA. In November 2016, Tatmadaw soldiers reportedly arrested and detained up to 80 men in a military camp in Muse Township, Shan State. Witnesses reported a 90 year old man was killed by the Tatmadaw when he attempted to escape during fighting between the Tatmadaw and the Northern Alliance.

4.7 There were also recent accounts of deaths in police custody. For example, the MNHRC was reported to be investigating the case of a man who was allegedly beaten to death by Yangon police while being interrogated in September 2018. The MNHRC also reportedly investigated a case of a man suspected of stealing a fishing net who died in police custody in Irrawaddy Region in August 2018, and recommended to the Ministry of Home Affairs that action be taken against the inspector and police officers involved.

DEATH PENALTY

4.8 While no executions have been carried out in Myanmar since 1988, courts continue to impose death sentences under Article 368 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (1898). A mandatory death sentence is imposed for murder, drug trafficking and drug possession. Criminals who receive the death penalty from district courts can appeal their sentences in higher courts. In July 2018, the Prisons Department reported that 33 (of 66) criminals who had received the death penalty since 2016 were appealing their sentences. As a final measure, criminals can plead for presidential clemency. No death sentences have been commuted to life imprisonment since the Thein Sein government (2011-2016).
TORTURE

4.9 The Penal Code outlaws the use of torture, however local sources reported that the Tatmadaw and police continue to use torture to elicit confessions and other information. The most common methods of torture reported were beatings and deprivation of food, water and sleep.

4.10 In general, torture and other abuses by authorities tended to occur most frequently in conflict-affected areas against people suspected to be members or supporters of EAOs, or who have participated in military operations. The UN Fact-Finding Mission identified Tatmadaw soldiers as the primary perpetrators of torture in Kachin and Shan States, during military operations, patrols or forced labour. In some cases they were reportedly accompanied by militias including the Pyithu Sit (armed groups of civilians trained by the Tatmadaw, known as ‘People’s Militias’), or the Sa Ya Pa. The UN Fact-Finding Mission described torture victims in Kachin and Shan States as mostly men aged between 18-40 years old (of ‘fighting age’), typically of the same ethnic group as fighters with whom the Tatmadaw was engaged in conflict.

4.11 For example in June 2017, the Tatmadaw reportedly detained and tortured a man suspected of being a TNLA member in Namhsan Township, Shan State. The man’s body was found the day after his reported torture in a TNLA uniform. The UN Fact-Finding Mission also reported incidents of torture of older men, usually village administrators or community leaders, who were accused of collaborating with EAOs. In August 2017, Tatmadaw soldiers reportedly tortured an elderly male IDP in Kutkai Township, Shan State, who was suspected of being a messenger for the TNLA. The torture was reported to last for more than 24 hours in multiple locations and involved interrogations with severe beatings, rope binding, hot wax burns and the breaking of a limb. Women and children were also reported to be subjected to torture, including rape or other forms of sexual violence, by the Tatmadaw in Kachin and Shan States. The cases typically involved the use of torture in order to obtain information or confessions regarding EAO activities, or as punishment for perceived sympathy for the Tatmadaw’s opponents.

4.12 There are also credible reports of torture by authorities and some civilians against Rohingya people, including children, in Rakhine State, with the majority of incidents occurring in the period around 25 August 2017 (see Rohingya, Violence). According to the US Department of State, one in 10 Rohingya refugees interviewed in Bangladesh had witnessed acts of mutilation or possible torture against Rohingya by Tatmadaw soldiers and civilians during the 2017 security operations. Acts of mutilation included the cutting and spreading of entrails, severed limbs or hands/feet, pulling out nails or burning beards and genitals to force a confession, or being burned alive. 33 Rohingya interviewed by the US Department of State also reported groups of Rohingya being forced to stay outside for hours, both as a form of punishment or as part of interrogations, during the security operations. Rohingya who were in prison prior to the events of 25 August also experienced or witnessed torture, particularly during interrogation. Amnesty International documented cases of torture against 17 Rohingya men and two teenage boys which primarily took place while in custody on BGP bases in Rathedaung Township and Buthidaung Township in the period around 25 August. During interrogations, the detainees were subjected to severe beating, burning, stress positions for prolonged periods, and in at least five cases, sexual violence including the burning and mutilation of genitalia. Some detainees were also deprived of water for days, and food for over a week. According to Amnesty International and the US Department of State, authorities rarely carry out investigations into incidents involving torture or punish the alleged perpetrators. The US Department of State also noted that authorities rarely take action to investigate allegations of torture by the Tatmadaw or police forces, or to punish the alleged perpetrators.
CRUEL, INHUMAN OR DEGRADING TREATMENT OR PUNISHMENT

Arbitrary Arrest and Detention

4.13 The Code of Criminal Procedure requires court permission for detentions exceeding 24 hours. In 2017, the authorities used the Unlawful Associations Act to arrest persons, often in ethnic and religious minority areas, on an arbitrary basis. The law allows authorities to extend sentences after prisoners have completed their original sentences. It also allows authorities to detain suspects without charge or trial if they believe an individual is performing, or may perform, an act that endangers the sovereignty and security of the state or public peace and tranquillity. According to the US Department of State, there were multiple cases to demonstrate that both the civilian government and the Tatmadaw continued to interpret the law broadly to detain activists, student leaders, farmers, journalists, and human rights defenders. It also reported that the government generally did not permit detainees to challenge the legal basis of their detention in court before the two-week pre-trial detention period.

4.14 The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported the widespread and targeted arbitrary arrest and detention of Rohingya across Rakhine State by the BGP and Tatmadaw. It highlighted an increase in Rohingya arbitrary arrests in northern Rakhine State between October 2016 and August 2017, which corresponded to the higher security presence during this period. Most arrested were reported to be questioned about their activities or knowledge of ARSA members, and were required to pay bribes for their release. The UN Fact-Finding Mission also reported mass arrests and detentions of civilians in Kachin and Shan States, both for forced labour and suspected links with ethnic armed organisations. In these cases, most victims were reportedly not provided a reason for their arrest, nor brought to trial.

Corporal Punishment

4.15 Corporal punishment is lawful in homes, schools and penal institutions. Article 66 of the Child Law provides for “admonition by a parent, teacher, or other person having the right to control the child”. Article 89 of the Penal Code states that “nothing which is done in good faith for the benefit of a person under twelve years of age... is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause”. Government directives prohibiting corporal punishment in schools are inconsistent with these laws. In 2017, the US Department of State reported that corporal punishment is still widely used as disciplinary tool for children.
5. OTHER CONSIDERATIONS

STATE PROTECTION

5.1 The Constitution guarantees citizens freedom from discrimination on the basis of ‘race, birth, religion, official position, status, culture, sex and wealth’. However, the law offers few specific protections to citizens to shield them from discrimination, and there are limited avenues through which citizens can pursue redress against discrimination. In addition, the law does not protect non-citizens, including the Rohingya.

5.2 The availability of state protection depends on a range of circumstances and is not necessarily determined on the basis of religion or ethnicity. Given the Bamar Buddhist majority dominates the public service, including the security forces, and widespread anti-Muslim sentiment, access to effective state protection is more difficult for Muslims, particularly the Rohingya.

Military

5.3 The Tatmadaw comprise an army, navy and air force and is led by the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, who is elected by the National Defence and Security Council of which the military controls at least six (of 11) seats. The Commander-in-Chief has broad powers, including appointing the key positions of one of the Vice Presidents, the Ministers for Defence, Home Affairs and Border Affairs, and the military representatives in the parliament. The Constitution also states that the determination of the Commander-in-Chief is final and conclusive, and in a state of emergency, the Commander-in-Chief exercises all legislative, executive and judicial powers. While official figures are not available, credible sources estimate the Tatmadaw’s size between 300,000 and 500,000 personnel. Estimates also vary on the proportion of the national budget dedicated to military expenditure, but most are between 13 and 14 per cent. The military also receives funding from other sources, which makes the absolute military budget indeterminable.

5.4 Officially, there is no military conscription and all service personnel are considered volunteers. However, local sources reported that some personnel are pressed into service to avoid possible criminal convictions or to escape poverty. Myanmar has acceded to the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and has taken steps in recent years to release any children under the age of 18 at the time of recruitment (since 2012) from military service. According to the UN Secretary-General Annual Report on Children and Armed Conflict, 101 children and youth were released from the Tatmadaw in accordance with a joint action plan with the UN on the prevention of child recruitment in 2012. However, there are continued reports of the Tatmadaw occasionally using both adults and children for forced labour, particularly in conflict-affected areas, though cases have reduced in recent years (see Children).

5.5 The Tatmadaw, rather than the police forces, have been the primary source of community protection for people in Rakhine State during periods of communal violence under the declaration by the government of a special state of emergency. However, there are credible reports of the Tatmadaw failing to protect communities, including through refusing to assist Muslims who sought their protection, supporting ethnic Rakhine leading violent attacks, and perpetrating extreme forms of violence (see Rohingya, Violence). Several credible sources including the International Crisis Group have suggested that the Tatmadaw applied its ‘four cuts’ counter-insurgency strategy (first developed in the 1960s) in Rakhine State following the 2016 violence. The ‘four cuts’ describes the cutting off of food, funds, intelligence and popular support of EAOs fighting for self-determination. The strategy has been criticised by human rights groups in that it directly targets civilian populations in conflict zones. In Kachin State and northern Shan State, the Tatmadaw reportedly failed to protect civilians in conflict zones, including preventing the distribution of food and relief to conflict-affected communities in Kachin State on the basis that distributions assist KIA combatants.

5.6 Given the historical role of the military in Myanmar’s government, military personnel have tended to be immune from prosecution for alleged human rights violations. There have been a small number of convictions against soldiers for murder under national law in recent years, but these have generally involved junior officers and resulted in short sentences. The highest profile conviction against the Tatmadaw was 10 years imprisonment with hard labour handed down to seven soldiers in April 2018, following the Reuters report on the Inn Din massacre (see Media and Extrajudicial Killings). This was the first time that security forces have been held accountable for violence against the Rohingya. In September 2018, the UN Fact-Finding Mission called for Commander-in-Chief and five generals to be prosecuted for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes with regard to their actions in Rakhine State in August 2017.

5.7 The Tatmadaw have also been directly involved in propagating hate speech, particularly against the Rohingya. Facebook’s head of cybersecurity policy said it had found “clear and deliberate attempts to covertly spread propaganda that were directly linked to the Myanmar military”, and in August 2018 removed several accounts of senior Tatmadaw officials, including that of the Commander-in-Chief.

5.8 Overall, DFAT assesses that while the Tatmadaw do provide protection to some civilians, others are not afforded protection, particularly the Rohingya in Rakhine State and civilians in Kachin and Shan States. DFAT further assesses that the Tatmadaw typically act with impunity.

Police

5.9 The Myanmar Police Force is responsible for law enforcement outside of conflict and ceasefire areas, and reports to the military-appointed Minister of Home Affairs. Nationally there are 75,000 police, and each of the states and regions has its own local force. The BGP are active in Rakhine State, and are responsible for border security along the Myanmar-Bangladesh border, managing checkpoints and documenting the movement of Rohingya and others within the state.

5.10 Weak rule of law is a key challenge to effective state protection in Myanmar. Successive governments have publicly committed to improving the rule of law and reforming law and order institutions, however few means exist for victims of crime to seek protection or redress. Police units are often inadequately funded, staffed, equipped and trained, which negatively affects police capability and responsiveness. Most crimes are unreported or are not investigated. Only around eight per cent of the police force are women, which can constrain the investigation of crimes such as rape and human trafficking due to a cultural reluctance by female victims to discuss such crimes with male officers.

5.11 Police complaint processes require official identity documentation to lodge complaints. This means that those without appropriate documentation, including the Rohingya, are often unable to make police complaints. Furthermore, in Rakhine State local administrators and police are almost exclusively drawn from the Rakhine Buddhist community. Police are reported to regularly extort money from civilians to supplement low pay, and often request victims of crime pay substantial bribes to undertake criminal investigations. A survey published in 2017 by Transparency International found that 49 per cent of Myanmar people who had contact with police had paid a bribe. Corruption and extortion are particularly prevalent against the Rohingya in Rakhine State (see Rohingya, Freedom of Movement) and other minority groups (see LGBTI).
5.12 There are credible reports of police failing to protect civilians, including in the August 2017 security operations in northern Rakhine State, where regional police were reported to be either unable or unwilling to protect Rohingya victims, despite police protection being offered to other ethnic groups and their property. Police are also reported to have used excessive force against civilians in multiple cases in Rakhine State. The US Department of State documented BGP involvement in perpetrating violence against the Rohingya from August 2017, both independently and in coordination with the Tatmadaw (see Rohingya, Violence). Reuters reported that the paramilitary police supported the military operations in Inn Din, including the arbitrary arrest and execution of 10 Rohingya men. This report (which led to the arrest of two Reuters journalists, see Media) was informed by credible evidence, including photographs and testimony from paramilitary police. The BGP were also involved in perpetrating violence against Rohingya in the 2016 security operations. Police reportedly demoted an officer for the beating of Rohingya civilians, which was captured on video and posted on YouTube. Details of the investigation were not made public. In January 2018, police opened fire on a crowd of protesters demonstrating against a government ban on a Buddhist celebration in Mrauk-U, Rakhine State, killing seven ethnic Rakhine.

5.13 Investigations into police misconduct generally lack transparency, and charges against members of the police force need to have the support of the police leadership or a high profile public figure to have a realistic chance of success. Due to military control over the police, the police are also subject to political interference. There is substantial evidence of a police set-up in the case of Reuters journalists Wa Lone and Kyaw Soe Oo (see Media), including testimony from a police captain who was subsequently sentenced to one year imprisonment for violating the Police Force Maintenance of Discipline Law (1995). Civil society groups also reported that the police intentionally underinvestigated Ko Ni’s case in Yangon in 2017 (see Human Rights Organisations).

5.14 Overall, DFAT assesses that police have a limited ability to provide state protection to civilians, particularly the Rohingya in Rakhine State, are vulnerable to corruption, and typically act with impunity.

Judiciary

5.15 Civilian courts in Myanmar are organised into four levels: the Supreme Court of the Union; 14 State and Region High Courts; 67 District Courts and Courts of Self-Administered Divisions and Zones; and 324 Township Courts. The Constitution provides for courts-martial (military courts) to adjudicate cases involving defence personnel independently. At the state and regional level, civil matters are often managed by the bureaucracy rather than the judiciary. Criminal cases can be tried by village magistrates or escalated to state or federal courts.

5.16 As the government appoints senior members of the federal judiciary, political bias continues to affect the judicial system and judges typically do not see themselves as independent. The highest level of the judiciary, usually reserved for legislative matters, is the Constitutional Tribunal. While the Constitution protects the decisions of the Tribunal, its members are appointed by the government. Individual decisions by the Tribunal can be revisited after the resignation or removal of its members. In 2012, all members of the Tribunal were forced to resign, reflecting the lack of independence of the judiciary as a whole. Despite constitutional and legislative provisions for judicial independence, in practice corruption and a lack of independence are ongoing and significant challenges for Myanmar’s judiciary. Transparency International reported in 2017 that 39 per cent of Myanmar people who had dealt with the courts had paid bribes.

5.17 There are some efforts by both the government and the legal profession to reform the judicial system, however any reforms will likely take a long time to have a significant impact on outcomes. Public trust in the judiciary is very low and victims of crime often do not pursue legal action. The Legal Aid Law
(2016) allows for the provision of legal assistance to the poor, but the poverty threshold varies between state and region. Legal aid associations are organised by state and regional high courts and governments.

5.18 The Constitution contains protections against double jeopardy. Section 374 of the Constitution states, ‘Any person convicted or acquitted by a competent court for an offence shall not be retried unless a superior court annuls the judgment and orders the retrial’. A similar provision can be found in Section 6 of the Union Judiciary Law (2010). Cases of authorities bringing charges against individuals for the same crime, though in different townships, have been reported.

5.19 DFAT assesses that the legal system in Myanmar is weak and has limited capacity to provide state protection. In cases that are politically sensitive, engage vested interests or involve the security services, the judicial system cannot be relied upon to provide an independent outcome. DFAT further assesses that corruption within the judicial system may impinge on the prospects for a fair trial.

Detention and Prison

5.20 The Correctional Department of the Ministry of Home Affairs operates around 40 prisons and 50 labour camps (formally known as ‘agriculture and livestock breeding career training centres’ and ‘manufacturing centers’), housing an estimated 60,000 prisoners (50,000 men and 10,000 women in separate facilities). Some prisons are reported to house pre-trial detainees with convicted prisoners, and political prisoners with common prisoners. Children and members of the LGBTI community are typically held in separate wards.

5.21 In April 2018, the government announced a presidential pardon for more than 8,000 prisoners to be released, the majority of whom were sentenced on drug charges but also included 36 political prisoners. In May 2018, 259 prisoners were released, including Muslim interfaith activists Zaw Zaw Latt and Pwint Phyu Latt. As at December 2018, there were 35 political prisoners serving sentences, 56 people detained awaiting trial for political activity, and another 236 people were awaiting trial for political activity outside of prison.

5.22 The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is permitted to undertake visits to prisons and labour camps, but it faces restrictions in Rakhine and Kachin States. ICRC’s reports are shared with prison authorities on a confidential basis, and it is working with the government to improve prison conditions. The MNHRC also undertakes planned inspections of prisons and detention centres, including in northern Rakhine State, with government approval.

5.23 Local sources described the conditions in both prisons and labour camps as harsh, and include the extensive use of shackling. Overcrowding remains a problem in the prison system, and in 2017, the MNHRC reported that 30 prisons collectively had a capacity of 31,500 but detained over 50,000. The government reported that the Insein Central Prison, the largest in Myanmar, housed 12,000 prisoners as at June 2018, though its official capacity was 10,000 prisoners. Some prisons have a health ward with referral systems to state hospitals, but generally prisoners have poor access to medicine and health services. Corruption is reported to be prevalent in both prisons and labour camps, with inmates bribing guards to receive water, prison uniforms, and other necessities, or to be granted positions of authority to supervise other inmates. Legal representatives are typically able to gain access to their clients in prison, and families of inmates are able to visit, provided they can prove their relationship by showing authorities their household list, though local sources indicated that legal counsel and family visits were not permitted in northern Rakhine State.

5.24 A new prison law has been under parliamentary consideration since 2015. In March 2018, the UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Myanmar expressed concern that the draft law did not meet international standards with regard to torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment, and lacked an independent oversight mechanism for prisons.
INTERNAL RELOCATION

5.25 Article 355 of the Constitution protects the right of citizens ‘to settle and reside in any place within the Union of Myanmar according to law’. Freedom of internal travel is generally permitted except for non-citizens and for civilians in conflict areas (see Rohingya, Freedom of Movement and Movements restrictions in Rakhine, Kachin and Shan States). In 2016, the Ward or Village Tract Administration Law (2012) was amended so that the requirement for mandatory guest registration was applicable only to guests staying in a private residence for a month or more. The residents of states where with active conflicts typically face greater restrictions on their freedom of movement than in other regions.

5.26 According to the International Organization of Migration (IOM), in 2014 9.4 million people (20 per cent of the population) migrated internally, for a variety of reasons including accessing better economic, lifestyle and education opportunities. Seasonal migration routes for improved livelihood opportunities are well-established. The 2015 election and resulting economic changes have been a key driver of rural to urban migration. Some members of minority ethnic groups do not speak Burmese, which can make relocation to Burmese-speaking areas practically difficult and likely limits relocation options to areas with a common language. There are reports of IDPs in conflict-affected areas both voluntarily moving, or being forcibly moved, into IDP camps. Once residing in a camp, IDPs are typically limited by movement restrictions.

5.27 With the exception of Rohingya and civilians in conflict-affected areas, DFAT assesses that most people in Myanmar can typically relocate within Myanmar, subject to their individual financial circumstances.

Movements restrictions in Rakhine, Kachin and Shan States

5.28 Following the 2012 violence, formal restrictions on movement within Rakhine State have increased and expanded to include Kaman and other Muslims, in addition to the Rohingya population (see Rohingya, Freedom of movement). Other ethnic and religious groups, including the majority ethnic Rakhine, largely enjoy freedom of movement, within their financial means. Ethnic Rakhine may limit their travel to Muslim villages, in part due to inter-communal tensions.

5.29 The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported a range of formal restrictions on movement in Kachin and Shan States, including checkpoints, documentation checks and curfews. It also reported self-imposed movement restrictions for fear of safety from fighting or landmines. Movement is reported to be most restricted for individuals holding identification documents issued by EAOs.

Household Registration Lists

5.30 Under the Ward or Village Tract Administration Law, Village and Ward Tract Administrators throughout Myanmar are required to compile and register births and deaths and move people to and from household lists. As such, households are required to report any changes, including relocations and marriages, to Township Administration Offices. The types of documentation and the amounts of money required for this process vary across different jurisdictions. For example, Amnesty International reported in 2017 that transferring individuals from one household list to another in Rakhine State required a copy of the existing household list, a marriage certificate, a copy of their identity card, and letter of recommendation from the ward or village authority. Households are also required to present a copy of their list to authorities upon request. Household lists are issued and updated by the Ministry of Immigration and Population and the Ministry of Home Affairs.
5.31 Household registration is required for the issuance of identity documentation, school enrolment (particularly at the secondary and higher levels), accessing services (including health, electricity and water), marriage and travel permission. Since the expiration of TRCs (see Rohingya, Citizenship, and National Identity Cards) in 2015, household lists have been the only form of identification for many Rohingya.

5.32 In northern Rakhine, household lists were reported to be updated annually by the Committee for the Prevention of the Illegal Immigration of Foreigners (commonly known as Ma Ka Pa) and the BGP, as recently as 2018. Annual inspections are not conducted elsewhere in Myanmar. In 2017, Amnesty International reported cases of residents who were not present during the annual checks without travel permission being removed from their household lists. It also reported that people who return from abroad after being deleted from their household list risk arrest and conviction for immigration offences. Bribe is reported to be used to prevent deletions from household lists, however the costs are considered high by local standards. In central Rakhine, some household lists have reportedly not been updated since the 2012 violence. In 2017, Amnesty International described increased difficulties for Rohingya in adding births to household lists since 2016 (see Rohingya, Citizenship, and Birth and Death Certificates).

5.33 If a person is found to be unregistered, the penalty is a maximum of seven days detention at the police station, during which time the person must prove they belong to a household and be registered on their household list by the head of the household. It is unclear what would happen if a person were not claimed by a household head, and DFAT does not have any information on how often or how consistently penalties for incorrect registration are applied. The UN Fact-Finding Mission concluded that most Rohingya who departed Myanmar following security operations are unlikely to have documentation proving former residency.

TREATMENT OF RETURNEES

Exit and Entry Procedures

5.34 There are three international airports in Yangon, Mandalay and Naypyidaw. Check-in and immigration procedures for Myanmar passport-holders are functionally similar to standard international practices. Airport staff review booking details and check the name in the passport against the name on the reservation. Customs and immigration staff vet baggage, and immigration staff check that the passport photograph matches the bearer and scan the passport. There is no integration of police and immigration identity systems.

5.35 Travel to or from Myanmar by land is restricted to a limited number of official border crossing points in Thailand, Laos, China and India. Border crossings can close with little or no notice, and entry restricted to the residents of the bordering states or the immediate area or border town. However, there are lengthy stretches of unmonitored border areas where unofficial land crossings occur. A stretch of land at the international border between Myanmar and Bangladesh known as ‘no man’s land’ is considered part of Myanmar territory.

5.36 Irregular maritime movements from Rakhine State were reported following the August 2017 violence. In April and May 2018, inconsistent reports were provided to DFAT about five Rohingya who were registered in Aceh, Indonesia, following their departure by boat from Sittwe in February. The group initially reported that their boat was intercepted by the Myanmar Navy, who beat and killed seven crew and removed the boat’s engine. The group later reported that the missing crew had left the boat in an attempt to swim to shore after the Navy had intercepted the boat, physically assaulted the adult men and removed the boat’s engine. The Myanmar Navy denied intercepting the boat. During November 2018, Myanmar authorities intercepted four boats within Myanmar waters, all of which had originated from Rakhine State and were bound for Malaysia or Indonesia. The passengers were predominately Rohingya from Sittwe, and in each case the passengers were detained, questioned and returned to their port of origin. DFAT understands that on several of these boats, passengers cited a desire to access employment and better health care as the primary drivers behind their departure. The passengers were not reported to have been charged with offenses under Myanmar legislation.

5.37 In February 2019, UNHCR reported a small increase in the number of people fleeing to Bangladesh, following clashes between the AA and the Tatmadaw. This included both ethnic Rakhine and ethnic Chin who had reportedly fled military action.

Conditions for Returnees

5.38 Myanmar’s Ministry of Labour, Immigration and Population is responsible for conducting interviews of returnees, with the exception of Rohingya returnees who are managed by the Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief and Resettlement (see Conditions for Rohingya Returnees). DFAT is not aware of how often these interviews are conducted and what, if any, information is passed to government security agencies.

5.39 Refugees from Thailand (primarily Karen) who return to Myanmar via a formal assisted voluntary returns process undergo ‘national verification’, which can take up to a year, before being issued a CSC (see National Identity Cards) which allows them to exercise rights and access services in Myanmar. The Governments of Myanmar and Thailand, UNHCR and IOM have facilitated 164 formal voluntary returns of Myanmar refugees from Thailand since 2016, including 93 returns in May 2018. UNHCR, IOM and the World Food Programme provided these returnees with information on conditions in returns areas, counselling, financial support for transport (THB 1800/AUD 80 per person), reintegration (THB 5,400/AUD 230 per adult and THB 3,600/AUD 155 per child), rations (THB 2,100/AUD 90), and basic non-food items.

5.40 By contrast, it is estimated 9,000 to 18,000 refugees have returned from Thailand informally since the 2012 signing of the ceasefire agreement between the government and the KNU. Despite the guarantee of citizenship through the formal return process, DFAT assesses the majority of refugees from Thailand prefer to return informally due to range of factors, including a continued mistrust amongst camp populations of the Myanmar government, and the lengthy process of verification, which can lead to family separation. Camp conditions in Thailand, while restricted and poor, at present compare favourably with conditions in many areas of Myanmar, and DFAT assesses this is also likely preventing greater numbers of returns.

5.41 DFAT is aware of a small number of voluntary returnees entering Myanmar via international airports during 2017 and 2018, but has not received reports of questioning of or adverse treatment toward returnees by government officials following their return to Myanmar. Returnees to Myanmar who departed the country illegally are technically subject to up to five years imprisonment for having illegally crossed a border, and DFAT is aware of, but unable to verify, reports of this provision being enforced in recent years.

5.42 In the past, the government has sought to exercise control over the travel and residence of high-profile opposition figures. On 17 August 2011, then-President Thein Sein announced that Myanmar would welcome the return of exiles who had fled the country during military rule. Former political prisoners and exiled activists are now typically able to return safely to Myanmar, however some have experienced delays from authorities when attempting to renew visas and residency permits.
Conditions for Rohingya Returnees

5.43 The governments of Myanmar and Bangladesh signed the ‘Agreement of Return of Displaced Persons from Rakhine State’ in November 2017. According to the agreement, Myanmar will receive former residents of Rakhine State who left for Bangladesh after the violent attacks of October 2016 and August 2017, if they can prove their former residency of Rakhine State. Myanmar and Bangladesh agreed to commence the repatriation of displaced Rohingya in January 2018 and to complete the process within two years. While the Myanmar government has formally committed to repatriating the Rohingya, there has been widespread international criticism of actions taken to date, with an almost exclusive focus on physical infrastructure for returnees and no clear plans for establishing security, providing information to potential returnees, or addressing inter-communal relations.

5.44 The government has announced that Rohingya who qualify for repatriation will be temporarily housed in one of two ‘reception centres’, which are reported to be secured by BGP officers and Tatmadaw soldiers. At the reception centres, returnees will reportedly undergo security checks, including body searches for weapons, and be registered and checked against township records. Returnees will have biometric information (fingerprints, retina scan and photo) taken and then be entered into an electronic identification system. Temporary identity cards will be issued. At the time of publication, the repatriation procedures require Rohingya returnees to undergo the citizenship verification process and accept NVCs (see Rohingya, Citizenship, and National Identity Cards). Health checks, involving a physical examination and checks for contagious diseases will also be undertaken. Returnees will stay at the reception centres for up to two nights, before being transferred to the longer-term transit camp. Returnees will then be relocated to one of 11 designated settlement areas, and required to build their own housing in the undeveloped areas through a government ‘cash for work’ program. DFAT understands that government infrastructure development, including the building of the centres, and some roads and houses, has mostly been led by the Union Enterprise for Humanitarian Assistance, Resettlement and Development in Rakhine.

5.45 According to Human Rights Watch, between December 2017 and February 2018, heavy machinery was used to level all remaining structures and vegetation in at least 55 villages in northern Rakhine State. Human Rights Watch reported in February 2018 that most destruction was in the 362 villages that were partially or fully burned following the August 2017 attacks, however two villages were intact in January 2018, prior to being bulldozed. Nearby Buddhist villages reportedly remained intact. The UN Fact-Finding Mission reported that authorities are appropriating vacant land and constructing houses for other ethnic groups, as well as for new infrastructure projects, including roads and mines. The government’s position that villages are being bulldozed to improve land and housing for returnees is undermined by the land being re-purposed for security installations. In some areas in northern Rakhine, ethnic Rakhine and Buddhists from other parts of the state are being encouraged, including by ethnic Rakhine activists, to migrate and settle in a deliberate effort to change the demographic make-up of the area and resist Muslim returns. According to local media, 40 Buddhist households (approximately 100 people) migrated to Maungdaw from southern Rakhine State in early 2018, where they stayed in a monastery for some time. Reportedly, they did not have government permission to settle in this location, and the local authorities subsequently relocated them to an area near to Inn Din village, southern Maungdaw. However, the government has tolerated Buddhist repopulation in some parts of northern Rakhine. The Rakhine State parliament (controlled by an ethnic Rakhine party) passed a motion opposing the resettlement of Rohingya in southern Maungdaw, citing public demand.

5.46 In June 2018, the government signed a Memorandum of Understanding on repatriation with UNHCR and the UNDP, but implementation has been extremely slow. In September 2018, UNDP and UNHCR made initial field assessments in 23 villages and three village tracts of Rakhine State to inform the repatriation process, but to date UNHCR and UNDP have received only partial access to northern Rakhine State. OCHA, UNHCR and ICRC all made public statements in 2018 that the conditions in northern Rakhine State are insufficient for the voluntary, safe, dignified and sustainable return of the Rohingya to Myanmar. Freedom of movement, citizenship rights and recognition as ‘Rohingya’, and access to their own land and livelihood opportunities are priorities for potential returnees from Bangladesh, but DFAT assesses none of these conditions will be met under the current return arrangements. At the time of publication, the repatriation process had not commenced.

5.47 In July 2018, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights on Myanmar reported that some voluntary informal Rohingya returnees from Bangladesh had been detained upon return to Myanmar, and convicted on unspecified charges. In August 2018, Human Rights Watch reported that BGP officers in Maungdaw Township, Rakhine State, imprisoned and tortured six Rohingya voluntary returnees from Bangladesh in separate incidents. According to the report, officers used stress positions, beatings with fists, sticks, and rods, burning and electric shock, and food and water restrictions during pre-trial detention to force a confession of affiliation with ARSA. Plain clothed military intelligence officers were also reported to beat, punch and kick the returnees during interrogations. The returnees reported that they had no access to legal counsel, and court proceedings were undertaken in Burmese, of which they had limited understanding. The six returnees were sentenced to four years imprisonment for illegally crossing the border, but only served a month of the sentence before receiving a presidential pardon.

5.48 A press release issued by the State Counsellor in May 2018 outlined that 58 returnees from Bangladesh (which included the six Rohingya interviewed by Human Rights Watch) would be pardoned and processed in accordance with the agreement between the governments of Myanmar and Bangladesh. It reported that following their transfer to a reception centre and identity verification, the group would be relocated to a transit camp. Four more Rohingya were reportedly later added to this group, taking the total number of returnees in this group to 62. According to Human Rights Watch, the group were forced to accept the NVC provided to them, and were threatened with re-arrest if they attempted to leave the BGP compound where they were held before being transferred to a transit camp. Two groups of Rohingya, including the six interviewed returnees, reportedly fled back to Bangladesh due to fear of re-arrest and torture. The State Counsellor’s press release specified that the arrangement for the returnees only pertained to those not involved in terrorism. DFAT was told by credible sources that 77 Rohingya returnees had been arrested, and surmises that some returnees remained in detention following the pardon, but is unable to verify this.

5.49 In October 2018, media and rights groups reported the return of seven Rohingya from India back to Myanmar. DFAT understands from credible sources that at least five members of the group were not deported but returned willingly to their village of origin (location unknown), but is unable to verify if this was with informed consent.

5.50 In November 2018, Myanmar and Bangladesh announced an agreement to commence the repatriation process, but the 2,000 initial refugees identified for return were found to be unwilling when interviewed by UNHCR.

5.51 DFAT is not aware of any credible reports of mistreatment of failed Rohingya asylum seekers stemming specifically from their pursuits for asylum overseas.

DOCUMENTATION

5.52 The Citizenship Law provides for full, associate and naturalised categories of citizenship. Full citizenship is only available to people belonging to one of the officially recognised “national races”, or people belonging to ethnic groups that are considered to have settled in the country prior to 1823. Associate citizenship is available to people who had applied for citizenship before the Citizenship Law came in to effect, while naturalised citizenship is only available to people with “conclusive evidence” that they or their parents entered or resided in Myanmar prior to 1948, or were born to at least one parent who holds some form of Myanmar citizenship.

5.53 There are variations of rights between these categories, and associate and naturalised citizens are not able to access the same rights as full citizens, including with regard to political participation, education, health, freedom of movement and property ownership. All citizens above the age of 18 in Myanmar are eligible to vote, but only full citizens whose parents were both also full citizens are eligible to stand for election. Enrolment in some university degrees, including medicine, law and engineering, is also restricted to full citizens. The government can revoke ‘in the interests of the State’ the citizenship, associate citizenship or naturalised citizenship of any person except those who are citizens by birth.

5.54 Transparency International reported in 2017 that 40 per cent of Myanmar people who had applied for identity documentation had paid a bribe for the service.

Birth and Death Certificates

5.55 The Ward or Village Tract Administration Law requires all births and deaths to be registered with ward or village tract administrators. The punishment for non-compliance is a maximum seven days imprisonment or MMK 5000 (approximately AUD 5).

5.56 Birth certificates provide citizens with access to social, education and health services. Citizens without birth certificates may be denied higher education and job opportunities. In 2014 and 2015, the government conducted nationwide campaigns to raise awareness about the procedures of birth registration, and in 2017, less than 20 per cent of children below the age of five were reported to be unregistered. While most children in urban areas are registered, few children in remote areas have a birth certificate. Children in Rakhine State are most likely to be unregistered, and local sources reported to DFAT that Rohingya face difficulties in obtaining birth certificates (see Rohingya. Other restrictions on Rohingya in Rakhine State).

5.57 Myanmar’s first online birth and death registration system, managed by the Ministry of Planning and Finance, was launched in Mon State in August 2018. This pilot system allows all Township Medical Officers across Mon State to register and issue birth and death certificates using a digital mobile recording system. Deaths are reported to be underregistered, particularly in rural areas with limited access to health services.

National Identity Cards

5.58 Since Myanmar’s independence, several different identity cards have been issued under different laws:

- NRC: Often referred to as the ‘three-folding card’, NRCs were issued under the Residents of Burma Registration Act. NRCs do not include ethnicity or religion information. In 2017, the government launched a pilot project to replace paper-based NRCs with an electronic card in Naypyidaw, Mandalay and Yangon regions, and Rakhine State.

- TRC: Known as the ‘white card’, the TRC was intended as a temporary replacement for people whose NRC was lost or damaged. However, from 1995 Myanmar authorities began issuing TRCs to Rohingya and other minorities not officially recognised in the eight national races of the Citizenship Law, while their citizenship status was determined. TRCs were revoked in 2015, and replaced with a Temporary Approval Card (‘white card receipt’).

- CSC: Introduced under the Citizenship Law, CSCs were issued in accordance with the three categories of citizenship: full (‘pink card’), associate (‘green card’) and naturalised (‘blue card’). CSCs include ethnicity and religion information. Only small numbers of CSCs have been issued to Rohingya.

- NVCs: Previously known as ICNVs, NVCs (‘turquoise card’) have been issued since 2016 to people undergoing citizenship verification, but are not considered an identity document or proof of citizenship. The NVC does not include ethnicity or religion information. UNHCR have reported that although many Hindus are eligible for naturalised CSCs, they often do not have a form of documentation, and those who are documented are required by the government to obtain a NVC. Biometric data has been collected with the issuance of NVCs since October 2017. NVCs have been issued in Rakhine State by the Immigration and National Registration Department, accompanied by security forces. This has largely been implemented through a door-to-door process, as many Muslims remain reluctant to approach authorities directly and apply for the card. Many Rohingya continue to be unwilling to engage in the NVC process, due to a deep distrust of the government. DFAT is aware of reports of individuals who did not voluntarily participate in the process being issued NVCs (see Rohingya, Citizenship).

Passports

5.59 Myanmar introduced machine-readable passports in 2010. The government is currently working to introduce an e-passport system, which would include biometric information to help verify the identity of the traveller. Hand-written passports were issued prior to 2010 and are still considered valid if they have not yet expired.

5.60 Until 2014, there were two passport-issuing centres, located in Yangon and Mandalay. In January 2014 the government opened a further 15 passport issuing centres across the country, and there are now passport offices in every state and region. In order to obtain a passport, Myanmar citizens need to present their CSC, parent’s CSC and household registration, and fill out an additional application at the issuing centre. The applicant needs to attend the office in person, where they have an official photo taken. Offices usually specify 10-15 working days for processing, however timeframes vary depending on the office. For example, DFAT was informed in 2018 that Chin passport applicants at the Hakha office commonly wait up to two months for passports to be issued. Bribes are also reported to be required for, and to expedite, passport processing (see Prevalence of Fraud).

PREVALENCE OF FRAUD

5.61 Document fraud is highly prevalent in Myanmar. Fraud can take the form of fake documentation, or genuine documentation provided on the basis of fraudulent information. The prevalence of corruption in Myanmar means that fake identity documentation can be purchased with relative ease, and identity feeder documents including birth, marriage and divorce certificates; household registration lists; and NRCs, CSCs and NVCs, are all subject to significant fraud. While passports have more sophisticated security features, it is possible to obtain a genuine passport using a fake national identity card.

5.62 DFAT is aware of reports of citizens of Myanmar and Bangladesh disposing of their identity documentation to obfuscate their identity and fraudulently apply for protection. DFAT does not have any information about the treatment by authorities of those determined to have fraudulent documents.
EXHIBIT 4
BURMA 2018 HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Burma has a quasi-parliamentary system of government in which the national parliament selects the president and constitutional provisions grant one-quarter of parliamentary seats to active-duty military appointees. The military also has the authority to appoint the ministers of defense, home affairs, and border affairs and one of two vice presidents, as well as to assume power over all branches of the government should the president declare a national state of emergency. In 2015 the country held nationwide parliamentary elections that the public widely accepted as a credible reflection of the will of the people. The National League for Democracy (NLD) party leader Aung San Suu Kyi was the civilian government’s de facto leader and, due to constitutional provisions preventing her from becoming president, remained in the position of state counsellor. During the year parliament selected NLD member Win Myint to replace Htin Kyaw as president, and the country held peaceful and orderly by-elections for 13 state and national offices.

Under the constitution, civilian authorities have no authority over the security forces; the armed forces commander in chief, Senior General Min Aung Hlaing, maintained effective control over the security forces.

Independent investigations undertaken during the year found evidence that corroborated the 2017 ethnic cleansing of Rohingya in Rakhine State and further detailed the military’s killing, rape, and torture of unarmed villagers during a campaign of violence that displaced more than 700,000 Rohingya to neighboring Bangladesh. Some evidence suggested preparatory actions on the part of security forces and other actors prior to the start of violence, including confiscation of knives, tools, iron, and other sharp objects that could be used as weapons in the days preceding attacks by the Arakan Rohingya Salvation Army (ARSA). An additional 13,764 Rohingya fled to Bangladesh between January and September. The government prevented assistance from reaching displaced Rohingya and other vulnerable populations during the year by using access restrictions on the United Nations and other humanitarian agencies. The military also committed human rights abuses in continuing conflicts in Kachin and Shan States.

Human rights issues included reports of unlawful and arbitrary killings by security forces; torture; harsh and sometimes life-threatening prison conditions; political prisoners; arbitrary or unlawful interference with privacy; arbitrary arrest and prosecution of journalists and criminalization of defamation; substantial interference with the rights of peaceful assembly and freedom of association, including arrests of peaceful protesters and restrictions on civil society activity; restrictions on religious freedom; significant restrictions on freedom of movement, in particular for Rohingya; corruption by some officials; unlawful use of child soldiers by the government; trafficking in persons; crimes involving violence or threats targeting members of national, ethnic, and religious minorities; and the use of forced and child labor. Consensual same-sex acts among adults remained criminalized, although those laws were rarely enforced.

Although the government took some limited actions to prosecute or punish officials responsible for abuses, the vast majority of such abuses continued with impunity.

Some nonstate groups committed human rights abuses, including killings, unlawful use of child soldiers, forced labor of adults and children, and failure to protect civilians in conflict zones. These abuses rarely resulted in investigations or prosecutions.

Section 1. Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Arbitrary Deprivation of Life and Other Unlawful or Politically Motivated Killings

There were many reports security forces committed arbitrary or unlawful killings (see also section 1.g.).

Security forces used excessive and sometimes lethal force against civilians. On January 16, police in Mrauk-U shot and killed seven and injured 12 Rakhine demonstrators who were protesting a decision by officials to cancel an annual event in commemoration of the anniversary of the end of the Arakan Dynasty. Police beat demonstrators--some of whom threw stones and attempted to take over a government administrative building--in addition to firing live rounds into the crowd.

There were several documented extrajudicial killings of Rohingya in Rakhine State during the year and several documented assaults by police against unarmed Rohingya.

On April 5, government soldiers shot and killed the environmental rights activist and community leader Saw O Moo in Karen State. The military stated that Saw O
Moo, who was riding a motorcycle with a Karen National Liberation Army (KNLA) fighter, was suspected of involvement in planning attacks. His family and other activists denied this claim and said he was only giving a ride to the KNLA fighter.

With additional, albeit still limited, access to northern Rakhine State granted by the government during the year, Amnesty International reported that Arakan Rohingya Salvation Army (ARSA) fighters were almost certainly responsible for a massacre of 53 Hindu villagers in Kha Maung Seik Village, Maungdaw Township, in August 2017.

The trial of four people charged in the death of Ko Ni, a prominent Muslim lawyer and adviser to Aung San Suu Kyi who was assassinated outside Rangoon’s international airport in January 2017, continued as of October. Civil society groups and religious groups noted Ko Ni’s death had a chilling effect on lawyers working for constitutional reform and accountability for military abuses, as well as on Muslims fighting for improved treatment.

Arbitrary and unlawful killings related to internal conflict also occurred (see section 1.g.).

b. Disappearance

There were reports of disappearances by security forces.

There was no action taken during the year or additional information regarding the whereabouts of Rohingya men ages 15 to 40 who were reportedly arrested in 2017 by police without charges or warrants due to purported links to ARSA, several of whom reportedly were not heard from since their arrest.

Disappearances related to internal conflict also occurred (see section 1.g.).

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The law prohibits torture; however, members of security forces reportedly tortured and otherwise abused prisoners, detainees, and other citizens and stateless persons in incidents not related to armed conflict. Such incidents occurred, for example, in Rakhine and Kachin States. The government did not launch any investigation into reports of sexual violence by the military in prior years.
Security forces reportedly subjected detainees to harsh interrogation techniques designed to intimidate and disorient, including severe beatings and deprivation of food, water, and sleep. Human rights groups continued to report incidents of torture in ethnic minority areas. Authorities generally took no action to investigate incidents or punish alleged perpetrators.

At least two contingents of Border Guard Police (BGP) in northern Rakhine State in August 2017 tortured and otherwise abused 25 Rohingya men and boys, according to a report released during the year by Amnesty International. Torture included severe beatings, burnings, and sexual violence lasting several days or even weeks. One Rohingya teenager described being beaten severely while hung from a chain attached to the ceiling, first with a hard plastic stick, and then with gloves filled with nails.

On August 21, Human Rights Watch reported that the BGP apprehended and tortured six Rohingya refugees who fled to Bangladesh in 2017 and had since returned to Rakhine State. Authorities, accusing them of illegal border crossing, tried the refugees in Burmese, which they did not understand, and sentenced them to four years in prison.

Prison and Detention Center Conditions

The Ministry of Home Affairs operates the prison system and continued during the year to significantly restrict access by international organizations--other than the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC)--to prison and detention facilities generally. The military also operates detention facilities and did not permit access. There were continued reports that conditions in prisons and labor camps were harsh and sometimes life threatening due to overcrowding, degrading treatment, and inadequate access to medical care and basic needs, including food, shelter, and hygiene, although observers noted some minor improvement in more centrally located prisons.

Physical Conditions: The Department of Corrections under the Ministry of Home Affairs operated an estimated 47 prisons and 48 labor camps, officially called “agriculture and livestock breeding career training centers” and “manufacturing centers,” according to the government. More than 20,000 inmates were serving their sentences in these labor camps across the country. Authorities reportedly sent prisoners whose sentences did not include “hard labor” to labor camps in contravention of the law and rented out prisoners as labor to private companies. In spite of reforms in recent years, conditions at these camps remain life threatening for some, especially at 18 camps where prisoners work as miners.

A prominent human rights group estimated there were more than 90,000 prisoners; women and men were held separately. Overcrowding was reportedly a serious problem in many prisons and labor camps; a human rights group reported that occupancy at the country’s largest prison was more than double capacity. Some prisons held pretrial detainees together with convicted prisoners. Authorities held some political prisoners separately from common criminals, but political prisoners whom authorities arrested for problems related to land rights were generally held together with common criminals.

Medical supplies and bedding were often inadequate. Bedding sometimes consisted of a single mat, wooden platform, or laminated plastic sheet on a concrete floor. Prisoners did not always have access to potable water. In many cases family members had to supplement prisoners’ official rations with medicine and basic necessities. Inmates reportedly paid wardens for necessities, including clean water, prison uniforms, plates, cups, and utensils.

Detainees were unable to access adequate and timely medical care. Prisoners suffered from health problems, including malaria, heart disease, high blood pressure, tuberculosis, skin diseases, and stomach problems, caused or exacerbated by unhygienic conditions and spoiled food. Former prisoners also complained of poorly maintained physical structures that provided no protection from the elements and had rodent, snake, and mold infestation.

There were reports of custodial deaths due to health problems associated with prison conditions and lack of adequate and timely medical care.

Prison conditions in Rakhine State were reportedly among the worst, with hundreds of Rohingya arbitrarily detained in prison and nonprison facilities, denied due process, and subjected to torture and abuse by Rakhine State prison and security officials.

Administration: Some prisons prevented full adherence to religious codes for prisoners, ostensibly due to space restrictions and security concerns. For example, imprisoned monks reported authorities denied them permission to observe Buddhist holy days, wear robes, shave their heads, or eat on a schedule compatible with the monastic code. Citing security considerations, authorities denied permission for Muslim prisoners to pray together as a group, as is the practice for Friday prayers and Ramadan. Prisoners and detainees could sometimes submit complaints to judicial authorities without censorship or negative repercussions. The ICRC followed up with relevant authorities on allegations of inappropriate conditions.

Independent Monitoring: Although the ICRC had unfettered access to prisons, prisoners, and labor camps, it did not have access to military detention sites. The ICRC reported its findings through a strictly confidential bilateral dialogue with prison authorities. These reports were neither public nor shared with any other party.

d. Arbitrary Arrest or Detention

The law does not specifically prohibit arbitrary arrest, and the government continued to use the Unlawful Associations Act to arrest persons, often in ethnic and religious minority areas, on an arbitrary basis.

The law allows authorities to extend sentences after prisoners complete their original sentence. The law allows authorities to order detention without charge or trial of anyone they believe is performing or might perform any act that endangers the sovereignty and security of the state or public peace and tranquility. The civilian government and the military continued to interpret these laws broadly and used them arbitrarily to detain activists, student leaders, farmers, journalists, political staff, and human rights defenders.

Role of the Police and Security Apparatus

The Ministry of Home Affairs is generally responsible for the country’s internal security, with oversight of the Myanmar Police Force (MPF) and the General Administration Department, which has a role in security planning as part of its overall civil administrative responsibilities. The home affairs ministry is led by an active-duty military general who is nominated by the armed forces commander in chief in accordance with the constitution.

In conflict and some cease-fire areas, and in northern Rakhine State, representatives from the Ministry of Border Affairs, also led by an active-duty military general appointed by the commander in chief, have significant roles in security planning, as does the military itself. In these areas, lines of authority for internal security may be blurred. During the operations in northern Rakhine State beginning in August 2017, military commanders assumed primary control over all security arrangements and appeared to wield considerable operational influence over the BGP, which is administratively part of the MPF.

The MPF is a national police force with approximately 80,000 police officers. While the MPF continued to make progress in developing baseline capacity, there were still significant gaps in expertise and resources that posed challenges to building a force that effectively serves the public. The MPF specialized units devoted to counternarcotics, antitrafficking in persons, and other transnational crimes continued to make progress in developing operational and investigative capacity.

There were continued reports during the year of harassment and extortion of Rohingya by the BGP, including through surprise raids of private homes, usually with the involvement of the military, to inspect whether residents present matched official household lists. Such lists were often lost or damaged, and as a result these raids sometimes resulted in arbitrary detentions. The BGP also used excessive force. For example, BGP forces on June 28 shot an 11-year-old Rohingya boy in the leg near the border with Bangladesh without provocation while the boy was gathering firewood.

Civil society groups noted corruption remained a concern and that the MPF’s Special Branch continued to engage in surveillance and monitoring. Security forces continued to intimidate civilians through physical abuse and threats to livelihoods. Legal mechanisms exist to investigate abuses by security forces but were seldom used and generally perceived to be ineffective.

Arrest Procedures and Treatment of Detainees

While the law generally requires warrants for searches and arrests, personnel from the Office of the Chief of Military Security Affairs and police reportedly conducted searches and made arrests at will.

Except in capital cases, the law does not grant detainees the right to consult an attorney or, if indigent, to have one provided by the state. The government amended the legal aid law in May to provide the public access to fair and equal legal aid based on international standards and to ensure legal aid workers could operate independently and with legal protection, but by year’s end the legal aid system was not yet operational.
There is a functioning bail system, but bribery was a common substitute for bail. Bail is commonly offered in criminal cases, but defendants were often required to attend numerous pretrial hearings before bail was granted. In some cases the government held detainees incommunicado and refused detainees the right to consult a lawyer promptly.

There were reports of suspects in custody dying as a result of mistreatment by police. On September 26, Aung Aung, a taxi driver who was arrested September 12 with two men accused of theft, died after allegedly being beaten by police during his detention. The Myanmar National Human Rights Commission opened an investigation in the case.

Arbitrary Arrest: There were reports of arbitrary arrests, including detention by the military in conflict areas.

In May the military in northern Rakhine State rounded up dozens of Rohingya, almost all of them young men, who had previously fled to Bangladesh and returned informally. These Rohingya were processed for illegal entry into Burma and subsequently pardoned, allegedly on condition that they agree to be processed through the government’s official repatriation process.

Pretrial Detention: By law authorities may hold suspects in pretrial detention for two weeks (with a possible two-week extension) before bringing them before a judge or informing them of the charges against them. Lawyers noted police regularly detained suspects for the legally mandated period, failed to lodge a charge, then detained them for a series of two-week periods with trips to the judge in between. Judges and police sometimes colluded to extend detentions. According to lawyers, arbitrary and lengthy pretrial detentions resulted from lengthy legal procedures, large numbers of detainees, judicial inefficiency, widespread corruption, and staff shortages. Periods of detention prior to and during trials sometimes equaled or exceeded the sentence that would result from a guilty conviction.

Amnesty: On April 17, President Win Myint pardoned and the government released 8,541 prisoners, including 36 whom the Assistance Association for Political Prisoners-Burma considered political prisoners. The majority of the pardoned political prisoners were arrested under the Unlawful Associations Act on charges of affiliation with ethnic armed groups. The president also nullified a previous condition of political prisoners’ release under which they could be forced to serve the remaining prison term if convicted of any crime in the future.
e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The law calls for an independent judiciary, although the government appeared to manipulate the courts for political ends and sometimes deprived citizens of due process and the right to a fair trial, particularly regarding the freedom of expression. High-ranking officials, including President Win Myint and State Counsellor Aung San Suu Kyi, spoke publicly regarding pending trials during the year.

The criminal justice system was overburdened by a very high number of cases lodged against small-time drug users, which constituted an estimated 40 to 50 percent of caseloads in the courts. Corruption remained a significant problem. According to civil society organizations, officials at all levels received illegal payments at all stages of the legal process for purposes ranging from influencing routine matters, such as access to a detainee in police custody, to substantive decisions, such as fixing the outcome of a case.

The military and the government, directly or indirectly, were able to exert influence over the outcome of cases, often through overly broad or arbitrary application of legislation on speech or association. In one high-profile case, two Reuters journalists were convicted under a colonial-era law for reporting work in spite of exculpatory evidence presented during trial and procedural irregularities (see section 2.a.).

The attorney general of Yangon Region, one judge, and four other judicial officials were charged with corruption during the year (see section 4).

Trial Procedures

The law provides for the right to a fair and public trial, but it also grants broad exceptions, effectively allowing the government to violate these rights at will. In ordinary criminal cases, the court generally respected some basic due process rights such as the right to an independent judiciary, public access to the courts, and the right to a defense and an appeal. In practice, defendants do not enjoy the rights to presumption of innocence; to be informed promptly and in detail of the charges against them; to be present at their trial; to free interpretation; or, except in capital cases, to consult an attorney of their choice or have one provided at government expense. There is no right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defense, but defense attorneys in criminal cases generally had 15 days to prepare for trial.
Defendants have the right to appeal judgments. In May the Union Attorney General’s Office adopted a fair trial standards manual, but because of the low standard of legal education, prosecutors, defense attorneys, and judges were often unfamiliar with precedent, case law, and basic legal procedures. No legal provision allows for coerced testimony or confessions of guilt by defendants to be used in court; nonetheless, authorities reportedly engaged in both. There were reports of coercion to plead guilty despite a lack of evidence with promises of reduced sentences to defendants who did so.

Ordinary criminal cases were open to the public, but in practice members of the public with no direct involvement in a case were denied entry to courts. There is no right to confront witnesses and present evidence, although defense attorneys could sometimes call witnesses and conduct cross-examinations. Prodemocracy activists generally appeared able to retain counsel, but defendants’ access to counsel was often inadequate. There were reports of authorities not informing family members of the arrests of persons in a timely manner, not telling them of their whereabouts, and often denying them the right to see prisoners in a timely manner. Local civil society groups noted the public was largely unaware of its legal rights, and there were too few lawyers to meet public needs.

The government retained the ability to extend prison sentences under the law. The minister of home affairs has the authority to extend a prison sentence unilaterally by two months on six separate occasions, for a total extension of one year.

Political Prisoners and Detainees

The government continued to detain and arrest journalists, activists, and critics of the government and the military. According to civil society groups that use a definition of political prisoners that includes those who may have engaged in acts of violence and excludes some charges related to freedom of expression and religion, there were 36 convicted political prisoners, 53 political prisoners in pretrial detention or detained with trials in process, and 216 individuals released on bail while facing trial for political charges as of September. These numbers did not include detainees and prisoners in Rakhine State, estimated to be in the hundreds, many of whom likely meet the definition of political prisoner.

The former child soldier Aung Ko Htway, who was arrested in August 2017 for defaming the military following an interview he gave to an international media outlet detailing his experience as a former child soldier, was given a two-year prison sentence on March 29. He received an additional six-month sentence for contempt of court.

Many released political prisoners experienced significant surveillance and restrictions following their release, including an inability to resume studies undertaken prior to incarceration, secure travel documents, or obtain other documents related to identity or ownership of land.

Civil Judicial Procedures and Remedies

No specific mechanisms or laws provide for civil remedies for human rights violations; however, complainants may use provisions of the penal code and laws of civil procedure to seek civil remedies. Individuals and organizations may not appeal an adverse decision to regional human rights bodies.

Property Restitution

Under the constitution, the state owns all land; however, the law allows for registration and sale of private land ownership rights. Authorities and private-sector organizations perpetrated land grabs during the year, and restitution for past and recent land grabs was very limited.

The law provides for compensation when the government acquires land for a public purpose; however, civil society groups criticized the lack of safeguards in the law to provide payment of fair market compensation and said that compensation was infrequent and inadequate in such cases.

The government can also declare land unused and assign it to foreign investors or designate it for other uses. There is no provision for judicial review of land ownership or confiscation decisions; administrative bodies subject to political control by the national government make final decisions on land use and registration. Researchers and civil society groups had concerns that land laws facilitate land confiscation without providing adequate procedural protections. In some cases of land confiscation, compensation was inadequate or not provided, and advance notice was not given.

The 2016 land use policy emphasizes the recognition, protection, and registration of legitimate land tenure rights of small-holders, communities, ethnic nationalities, women, and other vulnerable groups. It also includes the recognition, protection, and ultimate registration of customary tenure rights, which previously were not legally recognized. In September parliament passed and the president signed amendments to the Vacant, Fallow, and Virgin Land Management Act that featured limited protections for land “defined in accordance with cultural and traditional systems of local ethnic nationalities.” On November 9, the Ministry of Agriculture announced that, effective from that date, small-holders have six months to register their land or risk becoming a trespasser on their own land; if rigorously enforced, this order could result in millions of people losing rights of access to their lands.

Civil society groups, however, raised concerns that laws continued not to recognize rights in traditional collective land ownership and shifting cultivation systems, which are particularly prevalent in areas inhabited by ethnic minority groups. Parallel legal frameworks and traditional forms of land tenure in areas controlled by ethnic groups in Kachin, Mon, Kayin, and Shan States were not recognized by the government. Ethnic and civil society groups staged protests during the year in Kachin and Kayin States, Mandalay Division, and elsewhere over the government’s land policies.

Observers were concerned that the law could be used to prevent displaced Rohingya, who had security of tenure over lands in northern Rakhine State that were burned by the military, from returning to those lands or receiving adequate compensation from the government. Government officials stated that burned land would revert by law back to the government, without clarifying if such land would be returned to those who previously had security of tenure. There was no systematic effort to document the security of tenure Rohingya previously enjoyed over land from which they were displaced since August 2017.

Following the military campaign in Rakhine State, authorities bulldozed village remains, demolished structures, and cleared vegetation, to reshape some former Rohingya villages and replace former establishments with security bases and other structural developments.

The law requires that land be returned if not used productively within four years, but civil society groups reported land taken by the military was left unused for much longer periods and that there was little progress in returning other land confiscated by the government.

The General Administration Department under the Ministry of Home Affairs oversees land return. Adequate compensation was not provided to the many farmers and rural communities whose land was confiscated without due process during the former military regime, including by the Myanmar Oil and Gas Enterprise, the Myanmar Ports Authority, and the military itself.

f. Arbitrary or Unlawful Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The law protects the privacy and security of the home and property, but observers said these protections were poorly enforced.

The law does not protect the privacy of correspondence or other communications of citizens, and activists reported authorities had expanded surveillance of civil society organizations’ operations.

Some activists reported the government systematically monitored the travel of citizens and closely monitored the activities of politically active persons, while others reported they did not experience any such invasions of privacy. The government reportedly conducted surveillance in some circumstances by using the Special Branch police, official intelligence networks, and other administrative procedures (see section 2.d.).

The law restricts the ability of Buddhist women to marry non-Buddhist men by imposing a requirement of public notification prior to any such marriage and allowing for objections to the marriage to be raised in court, although this law was rarely enforced.

In January state-run newspapers made public the names of more than 1,400 individuals, including children, whom the government allegedly deemed to be terrorists, the families of terrorists, or sympathizers of terrorist groups. No information was provided regarding how such determinations were made and whether the individuals in question were formally charged or in detention, wanted for prosecution, or sought for questioning. There did not appear to be any formal judicial process involved. Observers noted publishing such a list put the individuals at risk of harm.

In Rakhine State local authorities prohibited Rohingya families from having more than two children, although this prohibition was inconsistently enforced. Also in Rakhine State, local authorities required members of the Rohingya minority to obtain a permit to marry officially, a step not required of other ethnicities. Waiting times for the permit could exceed one year, and bribes usually were required. In 2016 the BGP in Buthidaung Township issued instructions to village administrators outlining additional requirements for members of the Rohingya community to obtain a permit to marry. Unauthorized marriages could result in prosecution of Rohingya men under the penal code, which prohibits a man from “deceitfully” marrying a woman, and could result in a prison sentence or fine.

g. Abuses in Internal Conflict

The military and eight ethnic armed groups signed the Nationwide Ceasefire Agreement (NCA) in 2015, and two more ethnic armed groups signed the NCA during the year. Nonetheless, incidents involving use of excessive force, disregard for civilian life, and other abuses in conjunction with long-running internal conflicts occurred across the country. The UN Fact-Finding Mission report, published in September, documented a pattern of disregard for civilian life, targeting of civilians, extrajudicial killings, and the use of sexual violence by the military during the past several years.

In Kachin State and parts of Shan State, clashes continued among NCA signatory groups, nonsignatory groups, and the military, with credible allegations of abuse of civilian populations by both the military and ethnic armed groups. The majority of such clashes occurred in northern Shan and Kachin States. In central and southern Rakhine State and southern Chin State, sporadic clashes between the Arakan Army and the military continued, and in early August, the Arakan Army clashed with the Arakan Liberation Party. In Shan State the military clashed with the Ta’ang National Liberation Army (TNLA) and the Restoration Council of Shan State (RCSS), even though the latter is an NCA signatory. Fighting between the RCSS and TNLA also continued. Both of these groups, and the military, were alleged to have abducted, tortured, and killed suspected combatants as well as burned villages. In Chin State and most of the southeast, widespread and systematic violent abuses of civilian populations in ethnic minority areas continued to decline, largely due to a number of bilateral cease-fire agreements reached with ethnic armed groups. These areas also broadly fall under the NCA.

In Kachin and Shan States, continuing armed clashes between the military and ethnic armed groups displaced thousands of persons, compounding long-term displacement of conflict-affected communities in these areas. The military blocked humanitarian access to ethnic armed group-controlled areas, where many of the displaced resided, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) reported the military at times fired into internally displaced person (IDP) camps.
Military air and artillery strikes from January to April in Kachin State, especially around the village of Tanai, forced thousands to flee their homes. Air strikes on January 26 killed at least two civilians. Nearby Kachin Independence Army (KIA) bases housed family members and civilians as well as fighters, and attacks on those bases killed or wounded both KIA members and civilians.

The military continued to deploy forces in most ethnic armed groups’ areas of influence and controlled most cities, towns, and highways. Reports continued of widespread abuses by government soldiers and some ethnic armed groups, including killings, beatings, torture, forced labor, forced relocations, and the use of child soldiers. Impunity for these abuses and crimes generally continued, although the military took disciplinary action in some cases.

Killings: Military officials reportedly killed, tortured, and otherwise seriously abused civilians in conflict areas without public inquiry or accountability. Following ethnic armed groups’ attacks on the military, the military reportedly exercised a harsh form of collective punishment against civilians. Military attacks, including aerial bombing operations, also resulted in civilian deaths. Some ethnic armed groups, most notably the RCSS and TNLA, allegedly killed civilians suspected of being members of rival armed groups. Clashes between government forces and ethnic armed groups, as well as among ethnic armed groups, broke out periodically in northern Shan State during the year.

In April seven soldiers were sentenced to 10 years in prison with hard labor for the killing of 10 Rohingya men and boys in the village of Inn Din in September 2017. The military stated four officers were among those sentenced, but did not release the names, ranks, or locations of detention. No steps were taken for accountability in other 2017 massacres in Rakhine State that were credibly documented by the United Nations and human rights groups.

On July 12 government soldiers reportedly killed six TNLA female medics in what the TNLA described as an execution following torture and rape. The military stated the six were killed during fighting between government and TNLA soldiers.

Abductions: There were reports government soldiers and nonstate armed groups abducted villagers in conflict areas.

On August 17, TNLA soldiers took Nang Mo Hom at gunpoint from her home in Shan State. The TNLA said she had obstructed its soldiers from collecting customs duties and was responsible for the death of one soldier, who was killed by government forces while seeking to extort money from local residents. The TNLA released Nang Mo Hom in October after sentencing her to three years in prison and subsequently granting her amnesty, under its own alleged legal authority, which the government does not recognize.

During a crackdown in September on Christians in the Wa Self-Administered Division, the United Wa State Army (UWSA) detained a reported 200 Christian leaders while also destroying churches and imposing severe limits on Christian worship, teaching, and proselytizing. The UWSA later released most of those it detained. The government exerts no authority inside the Wa territory, which has been under UWSA control since 1988.

Physical Abuse, Punishment, and Torture: NGO reports provided credible information that the military engaged in torture and beating of civilians alleged to be working with or perceived to be sympathetic to ethnic armed groups in Kachin and Shan States. There were also continued reports of forced labor and forced recruitment by the KIA, the UWSA, and the TNLA.

The military continued to take steps to cease forcing civilians to serve as military porters, yet unconfirmed reports continued that the military forced civilians to carry supplies or serve in other support roles in areas with outbreaks of conflict, such as northern Shan, Rakhine, and Kachin States. There were also unconfirmed reports that the military used local villagers as human minesweepers in conflict areas.

Civilians, armed actors, and NGOs operating inside the country and along the border reported continued landmine use by the military and armed groups. Although the government and ethnic armed groups continued to discuss joint demining action, the discussions did not result in any joint demining activities. UNICEF received reports that the military unilaterally undertook limited landmine clearance operations in the southeast and in northern Shan State where it cleared small numbers of improvised explosive devices and unexploded ordnance when identified.

The Department of Rehabilitation in the Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief, and Resettlement and UNICEF continued to co-chair the one national and four state-level mine risk working groups (MRWG) in Kachin, Kayah, Kayin, and Shan States. In Kayin State the MRWG included representatives from the state-level Department of Social Welfare, military, and ethnic armed groups, including the

The MRWG\'s coordinated mine-risk education, victim assistance, information management systems, and advocacy. They monitored and documented incidents and casualties from landmines and unexploded remnants of war. Between January and August, UNICEF and the MRWGs documented 193 casualties, including 45 children. Of these casualties, 89 percent occurred in Kachin and Shan States. Many incidents were not reported due to continuing conflicts in Kachin, Shan, and Rakhine States.

Child Soldiers: The government continued to implement the 2012 joint action plan with the United Nations to end underage recruitment and use of child soldiers in the context of the UN Country Task Force on Monitoring and Reporting (CTFMR), which oversees documentation and verification of grave violations against children. UN officials reported the military continued to make progress in decreasing the use and recruitment of children, as well as demobilizing soldiers recruited as children who were still serving in the armed forces. They also noted the timeframe for authorities to verify allegations of child soldier use and recruitment grew longer during the year.

In addition to the military, seven armed groups were listed in the UN Secretary General\’s 2017 report on Children and Armed Conflict as perpetrators of the recruitment and use of children: the Democratic Karen Benevolent Army, the Karen National Liberation Army, the Karenni Army, the Karenni National Progressive Party, the RCSS, Shan State Army South, and the UWSA.

From June 2012 to September 2018, the military released 924 individuals who were under the age of 18 when they were recruited, including 75 released at a ceremony in September. The military continued to implement age-verification procedures in the recruitment process, although there were reports middlemen continued to help underage recruits bypass these procedures, sometimes at the request of those recruits\’ families. Military directives issued in 2015 and 2016 to prohibit the use of children remained in effect.

The Ministry of Defense undertook efforts to investigate military personnel implicated in recruiting child soldiers. The military provided information to the CTFMR that linked specific accountability measures to the respective cases of child recruitment or use, allowing for verification of the military\’s accountability measures. The military did not make these reports publicly available. By law all accountability measures fall under military discipline or justice regulations.

The United Nations reported that at least 683 of the 924 child soldiers released by the military since June 2012 have received some support for reintegration into civilian life, although the quality and effectiveness of that support was uneven. The Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief, and Resettlement, UNICEF, and other partners provided social assistance and reintegration support to discharged children.

The military generally allowed UN monitors to inspect for compliance with agreed-upon procedures, to cease recruitment of children, and to implement processes for identification and demobilization of those serving in armed conflict. There were some delays in securing official permissions, and access to conflict areas was generally denied. The government continued to prevent ethnic armed groups from signing joint plans of action with the United Nations to end recruitment of child soldiers and to demobilize and rehabilitate those already serving.

Also see the Department of State’s Trafficking in Persons Report at www.state.gov/j/tip/rls/tiprpt/.

Other Conflict-related Abuse: The government further restricted the passage of relief supplies and access by international humanitarian organizations to conflict-affected areas of Rakhine, Kachin, and Shan States. The government regularly denied access to the United Nations, international NGOs, and diplomatic missions, arguing the military could not assure security or claiming humanitarian assistance would benefit ethnic armed group forces, although there was no ongoing conflict in northern Rakhine State. In some cases the military allowed gradual access only as government forces regained control over contested areas. Although locally based organizations had some access to the estimated 40,000 IDPs in areas outside government control, primarily in northern Kachin State, the military increased restrictions on access for local organizations, including through threats of prosecution under the Unlawful Associations Act against local humanitarian organizations operating in areas outside government control. The government has not granted the United Nations or other international organizations humanitarian access to areas in Kachin State outside of military control since June 2016. More than 107,000 persons remained displaced by conflict in Kachin and Shan States. In some cases villagers driven from their homes fled into the forest, frequently in heavily mined areas, without adequate food, security, or basic medical care (see section 2.d.).

The United Nations reported that conflict and fighting in Rakhine, Kachin, and Shan States led to substantially increased reports of the killing and maiming of children, including by landmines, and attacks on schools and hospitals.

There were some reports of the use of civilians to shield combatants.

Section 2. Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Expression, Including for the Press

The constitution provides, “every citizen shall be at liberty in the exercise of expressing and publishing freely their convictions and opinions,” but it contains the broad and ambiguous caveat that exercise of these rights must “not be contrary to the laws enacted for national security, prevalence of law and order, community peace and tranquility, or public order and morality.” Threats against and arrests of journalists continued during the year.

Freedom of Expression: Freedom of expression was more restricted compared with 2017. Authorities arrested, detained, convicted, intimidated, and imprisoned citizens for expressing political opinions critical of the government and the military, generally under the charges of defamation, protesting without a permit, or violating national security laws. This included the detentions and trials of journalists and other figures, applying laws carrying more severe punishments than those used previously.

The criminal defamation clause under the Telecommunications Law, known as Section 66(d), was frequently used to restrict freedom of expression and press. Use of the law continued apace from 2017. According to a local activist group that advocates for freedom of expression, 198 criminal defamation cases have been filed under Section 66(d) since the law was introduced in 2013. Several journalists, as well as critics of the government and the military, continued to face charges under this law. On January 6, Mon State authorities sued a Facebook user, U Aung Ko Ko Lwin, for a post disparaging the Mon State Chief Minister Dr. Aye Zaw, citing the separate Law Protecting the Privacy and Security of Citizens, which similarly criminalizes defamation.
Ngar Min Swe, a former newspaper columnist and prominent critic of the government, was arrested in July on charges of “excit[ing] disaffection towards the government” for a Facebook post he wrote in January that was critical of Aung San Suu Kyi. On September 17, he was given a seven-year prison sentence.

Other government prosecutions of politicians and activists included the September 10 high treason (Article 122) and defamation of the state (criminal code Article 505(b)) charges against Aye Maung and Wai Hin Aung for remarks that reportedly expressed support for the Arakan Army, and the October 8 two-year prison sentence under Article 505(c) for inciting conflict between ethnic or religious groups of Maung Thway Chuun for his speech criticizing Christian leaders of the parliament and criticizing the government for allowing Buddhism to “disappear.”

A court in Myitkyina on December 7 sentenced three Kachin peace activists--Lum Zawng, Nang Pu, and Zau Jat--to six months in prison with an additional 500,000 kyat ($320) fine for their involvement in a peaceful protest over conditions of internally displaced persons in Kachin State. They were charged under a section of Myanmar’s penal code that criminalizes defamation of the military, based on statements they made at the April protest, which followed an increase in fighting between the military and the KIA. A court in Myitkyina then fined three other activists who led a peaceful demonstration calling for the release of the first activists.

Other problematic laws that remained in force, including the Unlawful Associations Act, Habitual Offenders Act, Electronic Transactions Law, Television and Video Act, Official Secrets Act, Law on Safeguarding the State from the Danger of Subversive Elements, and Sections 124(a) and 505(b) of the penal code (which cover “exciting disaffection towards the Government” and committing an “offense against the State or against the public tranquility,” respectively), were used to censor or prosecute public dissent. The Law Protecting the Privacy and Security of Citizens, enacted in March, was also used to prosecute a critic of the NLD-appointed chief minister of Mon State.

On August 16, the chairman of the NLD in Magwe Region issued a notice instructing regional bodies to take legal action against people who use Facebook to severely defame State Counsellor Aung San Suu Kyi or the regional and national governments.

Some people remained wary of speaking openly about politically sensitive topics due to monitoring and harassment by security services and ultranationalist...
Buddhist groups. Police continued to monitor politicians, journalists, writers, and diplomats. Journalists continued to complain about the widespread practice of government informants attending press conferences and other events, which they said intimidated reporters and the events’ hosts. Informants demanded lists of hosts and attendees.

Press and Media Freedom: Independent media were active and able to operate, despite some restrictions. The government continued to permit the publication of privately owned daily newspapers. As of October authorities approved 28 dailies; however, press freedom declined compared with 2017, and the security forces detained journalists under laws carrying more severe sentences than those it used in previous years.

Local media could cover human rights and political issues, including democratic reform, and international investigations of the 2017 ethnic cleansing in Rakhine State, although they observed some self-censorship on these subjects. The government generally permitted media to cover protests and civil conflict, topics not reported widely in state-run media.

The military continued to practice zero tolerance of perceived critical media commentary, while members of the ruling party increasingly used existing legislation to prosecute journalists and a former columnist perceived as critical.

Two Reuters reporters, who were detained in December 2017 and charged under the Official Secrets Act related to their investigation of security forces’ activities in northern Rakhine State, remained incarcerated throughout their trial and were sentenced on September 3 to seven years in prison after a trial that many observers criticized as lacking due process. State Counsellor Aung San Suu Kyi, in a June 8 interview with Japanese broadcasting organization NHK and in public remarks at the World Economic Forum on the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) in September, rebuffed critics and defended the jailing of the two journalists.

Myanmar Now editor in chief Swe Win’s 66(d) trial continued in Mandalay as of October, and the court rejected a motion to dismiss the case. In March 2017 Swe Win was arrested because of allegedly sharing a Facebook post suggesting the monk Wirathu, a prominent Ma Ba Tha figurehead, violated the monastic code of conduct by making statements commending the January 28 assassination of well-known Muslim constitutional lawyer Ko Ni (see section 1.a.).
On October 1, a Dawei township court charged the editor of the Thaninthyari Journal under the Media Law over the journal’s November 2017 publication of a satirical article about a regional official.

On October 10, the Yangon regional government detained two editors and one journalist from the Eleven Media Group and charged them under Section 505(b) following publication of an article concerning the regional government’s alleged financial malfeasance. Following President Win Myint’s order to turn the case over to the Myanmar Press Council, the regional government dropped the charges on November 9, while holding out the possibility of reinstating charges if the press council’s ruling was unsatisfactory.

Radio, television, and the internet were the primary mass communication media. Circulation of independent news periodicals declined outside of urban areas, and circulation of government-controlled print media far exceeded independent media circulation. Several print publications maintained online news websites that were popular among those with access to the internet. The military, government, and government-linked businesspersons controlled the content of the eight privately or quasi-governmentally owned FM radio stations.

The government loosened its monopoly and control on domestic television broadcasting. It offered six public channels--five controlled by the Ministry of Information and one by the military; the ministry channels regularly aired the military’s content. The government allowed the general population to register satellite television receivers for a fee, but the cost was prohibitive for most persons outside of urban areas. The ministry signed licenses in February with five media companies, including formerly exiled media groups DVB and Mizzima Media, to broadcast their content in a landmark public-private broadcasting partnership. The ministry insisted that the five companies, which use state-owned broadcaster Myanmar Radio and Television’s transmission infrastructure, abide by government guidelines on content, including avoiding using the term “Rohingya” in most cases. Many media outlets reported the cost of applying for and maintaining a television channel was prohibitive.

Violence and Harassment: Nationalist groups continued to target journalists who spoke out critically regarding intercommunal and Rakhine State issues. Businesspersons engaged in illegal enterprises, sometimes together with local authorities, also harassed and threatened journalists reporting on their activities, including with the threat of legal action. Officials continued to monitor journalists in various parts of the country.
Censorship or Content Restrictions: Although generally not enforced, laws prohibit citizens from electronically passing information about the country to media located outside the country, exposing journalists who reported for or cooperated with international media to potential harassment, intimidation, and arrest. There were no reports of overt prepublication censorship of press publications, and the government allowed open discussion of some sensitive political and economic topics, but incidents of legal action against publications that criticized the military or the government heightened concern among local journalists and increased the use of self-censorship.

Self-censorship was common, particularly on issues related to Buddhist extremism, the military, the situation in Rakhine State, and the peace process. Journalists reported such self-censorship became more pronounced because of the trial and conviction of the two Reuters journalists. The government ordered media to use certain terms and themes to describe the situation in northern Rakhine State and threatened penalties against journalists who did not follow the government’s guidance, which exacerbated already high levels of self-censorship on this topic. Authorities prevented journalists from accessing northern Rakhine State, with the exception of government-organized trips that participants reported to be tightly controlled and designed to advance the government’s narrative. The number of such trips increased during the year. The government continued to use visa issuance and shortened visa validities to control foreign journalists, especially those not routinely based in the country.

The government censorship board reviews all films to be screened inside the country. This process resulted in the censorship of one film scheduled for screening at the European Film Festival in September because of nudity.

Libel/Slander Laws: Elements of the military sued journalists on multiple occasions for what they perceived as defamation or inaccurate reporting. The military sometimes dropped the cases after a lengthy court process.

Individuals, including political figures, also used the Telecommunications Law to sue reporters for perceived defamation. U Thawbita, a Buddhist monk in Mandalay, surrendered to police on September 28 after being charged under 66(d) because of a Facebook post he wrote criticizing the commander in chief and the military’s role in politics. He was released on bail, and the case continued at year’s end.
Internet Freedom

The government generally did not restrict or disrupt access to the internet or censor online content. The government set up a Social Media Monitoring Team and reportedly monitored internet communications without clear legal authority and used defamation charges to intimidate and detain some individuals using social media to criticize the military, government officials, or the ruling party. There were also instances of authorities intimidating online media outlets and internet users. Social media continued to be a popular forum to exchange ideas and opinions without direct government censorship, although there were military-affiliated disinformation campaigns on social media. According to the International Telecommunication Union, approximately 25 percent of the population had access to the internet in 2016, but estimated mobile phone penetration was 90 percent, and other experts noted the majority of mobile handsets in the country could connect to the internet. The most recent Freedom on the Net report issued in 2017 by international NGO Freedom House rated internet freedom in the country not free, consistent with previous years.

Section 66(d) of the Telecommunications Act limited freedom of expression online.

Academic Freedom and Cultural Events

Government restrictions on academic freedom and cultural events continued. The Ministry of Education in some cases demonstrated willingness to collaborate with international institutions to host educational and cultural events, as well as to expand educational opportunities for undergraduate students.

The government tightened restrictions on political activity and freedom of association on university campuses. In January, university administrations expelled 34 students in several universities for participating in student protests calling for increased education funding. In addition the Ministry of Education issued a directive in May forbidding speeches on political issues on university campuses and requiring details to be submitted in advance for the organization of seminars or talks, including names and biographies of all panelists and a list of all participants. Following widespread student protest, the ministry withdrew the directive and issued subsequent regulations that allowed political discussions while keeping in place the need for prior approval of topics and participant lists.
The government generally allowed the informal establishment of student unions. Nonetheless, no laws allow student unions to register officially with the government, and among university rectors and faculty there was considerable fear and suspicion of student unions. Although some student unions were allowed to open offices unofficially in some locations, the All Burma Federation of Student Unions, as in previous years, was unable to register but participated in some activities through informal networks.

There were reported incidents of the government restricting cultural events.

b. Freedoms of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The constitution provides for the freedoms of peaceful assembly and association, but the government restricted these rights.

Freedom of Peaceful Assembly

The constitution provides the right to peaceful assembly, although this right was not always respected in practice. Restrictions remained in place in 11 Rangoon townships on all applications for processions or assemblies. Some civil society groups asserted these restrictions were selectively applied and used to prevent demonstrations against the government or military. Farmers and social activists continued to hold protests over land rights and older cases of land confiscation throughout the country, and human rights groups continued to report cases in which the government arrested groups of farmers and those supporting them for demanding the return of confiscated land. Many reported cases involved land seized by the military under the former military regime and given to private companies or persons with ties to the military.

Local government officials in Yangon Region, Kayah State, and elsewhere required civil society organizations to apply for advance permission before holding meetings and other functions in hotels and other public venues. Officials forced venues to cancel civil society events where such permission was not obtained. Officials in Mandalay Division and Kayah State required civil society organizations to request advance permission from the local government to meet with diplomats.

At least 42 persons were arrested in May for their participation in peaceful antiwar protests in Rangoon, Mandalay, and other cities. Three people who were arrested for their participation in a related poetry reading were sentenced on September 19, two with fines of 20,000 kyats ($13) and one opting to serve 15 days in prison instead of paying the fine.

Following a peaceful protest on July 3 against the erection of a statue of the Burmese independence hero General Aung San, in Loikaw, Kayah State, 16 demonstrators were arrested; 11 of those 16 faced charges under Sections 505(b) for distributing pamphlets related to the protest. The trial continued as of October.

Common charges used to convict peaceful protesters included criminal trespass, violation of the Peaceful Assembly and Processions Act, and violation of Section 505(b) of the penal code, which criminalizes actions the government deemed likely to cause “an offense against the State or against the public tranquility.”

Freedom of Association

Although the constitution and laws allow citizens to form associations and organizations, the government sometimes restricted this right.

In June the State Sangha Maha Nayaka Committee ordered local branches of the organization commonly known as Ma Ba Tha to remove signs using that name, following a 2017 ban on the use of the name after which the organization formally rebranded itself the Buddha Dhamma Parahita Foundation. Some of its members, including Wirathu, were sanctioned in 2017 for inflaming tensions towards the Muslim community using ultranationalist rhetoric. Some local branches of the organization continued to use the name on their signs in spite of the ban, and as of October no action had been taken against them.

The law on registering organizations stipulates voluntary registration for local NGOs and removes punishments for noncompliance for both local and international NGOs. Some NGOs that tried to register under this law found the process extremely onerous.

Activists reported civil society groups, community-based organizations, and informal networks operated openly and continued to discuss openly human rights and other political problems. They reported, however, that state surveillance of such operations and discussions was common and that government restrictions on meetings and other activity increased during the year.

c. Freedom of Religion
d. Freedom of Movement

The law does not explicitly and comprehensively protect freedom of internal movement, foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation. Laws provide rights for citizens to settle and reside anywhere in the country “according to law.” Laws related to noncitizens empower the president to make rules for requiring registration of foreigners’ movements and authorize officials to require registration for every temporary change of address exceeding 24 hours.

Abuse of Migrants, Refugees, and Stateless Persons: The government committed widespread and systematic abuses against the Rohingya population (see Stateless Persons).

In-country Movement: Regional and local orders, directives, and instructions restrict freedom of movement.

The government restricted the ability of IDPs and stateless persons to move. While a person’s freedom of movement generally derived from possession of identification documents, authorities also considered race, ethnicity, religion, and place of origin as factors in enforcing these regulations. Residents of ethnic-minority states reported the government restricted the travel of, involuntarily confined, and forcibly relocated IDPs and stateless persons.

Restrictions on in-country movement of Rohingya were extensive. Authorities required the Rohingya, a largely stateless population, to carry special documents and travel permits for internal movement in five areas in Rakhine State where the Rohingya primarily reside: Buthidaung, Maungdaw, Rathedaung, Kyauktaw, and Sittwe. Township officers in Buthidaung and Maungdaw Townships continued to require Rohingya to submit a “form for informing absence from habitual residence” for permission to stay overnight in another village and to register on the guest list with the village administrator. Obtaining these forms and permits often involved extortion and bribes.

Restrictions governing the travel of foreigners, Rohingya, and others between townships in northern Rakhine State varied, depending on township, and generally required submission of a document known as “Form 4.” A traveler could obtain this form only from the township Immigration and National Registration Department (INRD) and only if that person provided an original copy of a family list, temporary registration card, and two guarantors. Travel authorized under Form 4 is generally valid for two to four weeks. The cost to obtain the form varied from township to township, with required payments to village administrators or to the township INRD office in amounts ranging from 50,000 to 100,000 kyats ($32 to $64). The government removed the Form 4 requirement between Maungdaw and Buthidaung townships in late 2017, only for individuals in possession of formal identity documents, although other formal and informal local restrictions on movement remained in place. Change of residency from one village or township to another in northern Rakhine State required permission from the INRD or the township, district, and state officials. While Rohingya could change residency, the government would not register them on a new household registration list in that new location. This practice effectively prevented persons from changing residency.

International and local humanitarian staff required travel authorizations from the union and state level to operate in Rakhine State. Local staff had to submit travel applications two weeks in advance, and they were often denied. Humanitarian access to northern Rakhine State was suspended entirely in August 2017; however, during the course of 2018, the Red Cross Movement, World Food Program, and several other organizations regained some degree of access. Media and human rights professionals were routinely denied access to Rakhine State.

Travel restrictions effectively prevented Rohingya from northern Rakhine State from traveling to other parts of the state, including the capital of Sittwe, and outside the state.

In May, Hla Phyu was arrested and convicted of false representation after attempting to leave an IDP camp in Rakhine State, where she had been living since her displacement during violence in 2012, and travel to Rangoon. The 23-year-old teacher, who is Muslim, had previously applied for official permission to travel without success, and eventually traveled without receiving permission. She was sentenced to a year in prison with hard labor.

There were reports of regular, unannounced nighttime household checks in northern Rakhine State and in other areas.

Foreign Travel: The government maintained restrictions preventing foreign travel of political activists, former political prisoners, and some local staff of foreign embassies. While some administrative restrictions remained, local organizations reported encountering far fewer delays and restrictions. Stateless persons, particularly Rohingya, were unable to obtain documentation necessary for foreign travel.

Exile: There was a sizeable diaspora, with some citizens choosing to remain outside the country after years of self-imposed exile. During the year the government encouraged exiles to help rebuild their country, and some returned home; however, the government appeared to maintain an opaque “black list” of individuals, including some from the exile community, who were prohibited from entering the country.

Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs)

An estimated 235,000 persons remained internally displaced by violence in Kachin, Rakhine, and northern Shan States as of September. The UN Office of Coordination for Humanitarian Affairs estimated that more than 28,000 people were displaced by armed conflict in Kachin and Shan States since January. The United Nations and other humanitarian agencies reported significant deterioration in humanitarian access during the year, and the military blocked access to IDPs and other vulnerable populations in areas controlled by nonstate armed groups (see section 1.g., Other Conflict-related Abuse). Approximately 128,000 Rohingya remained confined to IDP camps in Rakhine State following 2012 intercommunal violence. A small number of Kaman and Rakhine have also lived in IDP camps since 2012. This figure did not include an additional unknown number, likely in the tens of thousands, who were internally displaced following atrocities beginning in August 2017 in northern Rakhine State. Accurate figures were difficult to determine due to continued poor access to affected areas.

Fighting between government forces and ethnic armed groups continued in Kachin, Shan, Kayin, and Rakhine States. Ethnic armed groups also clashed among themselves in northern Shan State. Access to displaced persons in or near conflict zones continued to be a challenge, with the military restricting access by humanitarian actors seeking to provide aid to affected communities.

Some 101,000 Rohingya IDPs lived in Sittwe’s rural camps, displaced since 2012, where they relied on assistance from aid agencies. Humanitarian agencies provided access to clean water, food, shelter, and sanitation in most IDP camps. The government limited health and education services and livelihood opportunities through severe and systematic restrictions on movement. Conditions in Aung Mingalar, the sole remaining Muslim quarter in Sittwe, remained poor, with Rohingya allowed to leave the fenced and guarded compound only to shop for necessities at nearby markets or to visit outside health clinics if they paid a fee to security services. In an attempt to start closing the camps, the government relocated the Rohingya residents of some IDP camps in Rakhine State to nearby locations where they continued to be segregated and concentrated without improvements in freedom of movement or access to livelihoods.

In November, when in the past Rohingya have sought to flee Myanmar in boats after the start of the dry season, Myanmar naval authorities intercepted and detained a group of 106 Rohingya who attempted to leave Rakhine State by sea. Authorities returned some members of the group to Sittwe and others to an IDP camp. There were reports of Myanmar authorities detaining other groups also attempting to depart by boat.

During the year humanitarian agencies received travel authorizations to provide assistance sporadically, and international humanitarian staff were not allowed to travel outside of urban areas in Kachin, northern Shan, and northern Rakhine States for much of the year. Humanitarian access to Rakhine State was irregular and restricted, and humanitarian workers continued to be under pressure from local communities to reduce assistance to Muslim IDPs and villages.

The government continued to restrict humanitarian access throughout Rakhine State with inconsistent approvals of travel authorization requests. Local staff of humanitarian organizations, many of whom lived among affected populations, continued to have to apply for travel permits in order to provide services.

There were reports of some small-scale, spontaneous IDP and refugee returns in the southeast of the country.

Protection of Refugees

Access to Asylum: The country’s laws do not provide for the granting of asylum or refugee status, and the government has not established a system for providing protection to refugees. UNHCR did not register any asylum seekers during the year.

Stateless Persons

The vast majority of Rohingya were stateless. Following the forced displacement of more than 700,000 Rohingya to Bangladesh in 2017, an estimated 520,000 to 600,000 Rohingya remained in Rakhine State. There were likely significant numbers of stateless persons and persons with undetermined nationality throughout the country, including persons of Chinese, Indian, and Nepali descent.

Provisions of the Citizenship Law contributed to statelessness. Following the entry into force of the 1982 law and procedures, the government released a list of 135 recognized “national ethnic groups” whose members are automatically full citizens. This list excluded the Rohingya, and subsequent actions by the government rendered the vast majority of the Rohingya ethnic minority stateless. The law defines “national ethnic group” only as a racial and ethnic group that can prove origins in the country dating back to 1823, the year prior to British colonization. Several ethnic minority groups, including the Chin and Kachin, criticized the classification system as inaccurate. While the majority of the country’s inhabitants automatically acquired full citizenship under these provisions, some minority groups, including the Rohingya; persons of Indian, Chinese, and Nepali descent; and “Pashu” (Straits Chinese), some of whose members had previously enjoyed citizenship in the country, are not included on the government’s list. The Rohingya and others are technically eligible for full citizenship via standard mechanisms unrelated to ethnicity, but they must go through a special process with additional scrutiny that in practice requires substantial bribes to government officials to access the government’s family records or to ensure officials formally accept a citizenship application for processing. This process generally results in naturalized citizenship without the complete set of rights associated with full citizenship. The law does not provide protection for children born in the country who do not have a “relevant link” to another state.

The name Rohingya is used in reference to a group that self-identifies as belonging to an ethnic group defined by religious, linguistic, and other ethnic features. Rohingya maintained they have resided in what is now Rakhine State for generations. In 2016 the government established a policy of using “Muslims in Rakhine State” to refer to the population, although military officials and many government officials, particularly in Rakhine State, continued to use the term “Bengali,” which is considered a pejorative. This term is still used on identification documents. The government offers a citizenship verification process to Rohingya to determine who qualifies for citizenship on the basis of mechanisms in the 1982 law that provide pathways to citizenship other than being a member of a national ethnic race. The Rohingya community participated in this process in a limited manner. The government no longer requires all participants to identify as “Bengali” as a condition of participating in the process, nor does it require applicants to list their race or religion on forms in the earliest phases of the process, although implementing officials reportedly continued to require participants to identify as “Bengali.” Those who are verified as a citizen (of whatever type) would have “Bengali” listed as their race on their citizenship scrutiny card. This process and the separate national verification process were not seen as credible by the Rohingya community, in part because many continued to be told they were required to apply as “Bengali,” because the few Rohingya who received national verification cards or citizenship through these processes did not receive significant rights and benefits, and because the government implemented the process in a coercive manner. For example, there were reported cases that a government official required Rohingya to have a national verification card to go fishing or access a bank account. The government continued to call on Rohingya to participate, but many of them expressed the need for more assurances about the results of the process. Many said they were already citizens and expressed fear the government would either not affirm their citizenship or would provide a form of lesser citizenship--naturalized rather than full--thereby formalizing their lack of rights.

According to the Citizenship Law, two lesser forms of citizenship exist: associate and naturalized. According to other legal statutes, these citizens are unable to run for political office; serve in the military, police, or public administration; inherit land or money; or pursue certain professional degrees, such as medicine and law. According to the Citizenship Law, only the third generation of associate or naturalized citizens are able to acquire full citizenship.

Rohingya experienced severe legal, economic, and social discrimination. The government required them to receive prior approval for travel outside their village of residence; limited their access to higher education, health care, and other basic services; and prohibited them from working as civil servants, including as doctors, nurses, or teachers. Authorities singled out Rohingya in northern Rakhine State to perform forced labor and arbitrarily arrested them. Authorities required Rohingya to obtain official permission for marriages and limited the registration of children to two per family, but local enforcement of the two-child policy was inconsistent. For the most part, authorities registered additional children beyond the two-child limit for Rohingya families, yet there were cases of authorities not doing so.

Restrictions impeded the ability of Rohingya to construct houses or religious buildings.

Section 3. Freedom to Participate in the Political Process
The constitution provides citizens the ability to choose their government through elections held by secret ballot, although certain provisions prevent it from being a fully representational system and assuring the free expression of the will of the people. Constitutional provisions grant one-quarter of all national and regional parliamentary seats to active-duty military appointees and provide the military with the authority to appoint the ministers of defense, home affairs—which has responsibility for subnational governance as well as police, prisons, and other matters—and border affairs, and indefinitely assume power over all branches of the government should the president declare a national state of emergency. A separate constitutional provision prohibits persons with immediate relatives holding foreign citizenship from becoming president. Amending the constitution requires more than 75 percent approval by members of parliament, giving the military effective veto power over constitutional amendments.

Elections and Political Participation

Recent Elections: International organizations reported the country conducted its November by-elections for 13 national- and state-level offices in accordance with generally accepted democratic principles. Observers considered the 2015 national election to be generally reflective of the will of the people, notwithstanding some structural shortcomings. Observers raised concerns that 25 percent of seats in parliament were reserved for unelected military officers; potential Muslim candidates were disqualified by their political parties on an apparently discriminatory basis; almost all members of the Rohingya community, many of whom voted in elections prior to 2015, were disenfranchised; and the government canceled voting in some conflict-affected ethnic minority areas. The NLD, chaired by Aung San Suu Kyi, won more than 77 percent of the contested 1,150 seats at the state, regional, and union levels in the 2015 election.

Political Parties and Political Participation: Opposition parties and civil society organizations continued to exercise their rights to assemble and protest.

Participation of Women and Minorities: No laws limit the participation of women and members of minorities in the political process, and they did participate. Nevertheless, women and minorities continued to be underrepresented in government. Aung San Suu Kyi was the only woman in a cabinet of 24 ministers serving at the national level. The representation of women at both the national and the state and regional levels was more than 10 percent among elected representatives. Women led two subnational governments, including the chief ministers of Kayin State and Tanintharyi Region.

As of October, five chief ministers of the seven ethnic states belonged to the ethnic groups of their states, including the chief minister of Rakhine State; one of two union-level vice presidents belonged to the Chin ethnic minority group and one belonged to the Mon ethnic group. The representation of ethnic minority parliamentarians from ethnic minority political parties at both the national, state, and regional level was approximately 9 percent. These figures from all levels did not account for ethnic minority members of the NLD (which included numerous ethnic members) or the Union Solidarity and Development Party.

Rohingya continued to be excluded from the political process, because their political rights (whether to vote or run for office) remained severely curtailed since the vast majority are stateless. Although Rohingya comprised approximately one-third of the total population in Rakhine State and clear majorities in some voting districts at the time of the 2015 national election, there were no Rohingya representatives in the state parliament, and most Rohingya-majority areas were represented by an ethnic Rakhine nationalist party.

Section 4. Corruption and Lack of Transparency in Government

The law provides criminal penalties for corruption by officials, and the government continued efforts to curb corruption. Although anecdotal reports suggested corruption among elected officials declined significantly since 2016, the government’s anticorruption efforts remained limited in some parts of the government, including the General Administration Department, which falls under the authority of the Minister of Home Affairs, an active-duty general who is appointed by the military per the constitution.

Corruption: Corruption remained a problem, particularly in the judiciary. Police reportedly often required victims to pay substantial bribes for criminal investigations and routinely extorted money from the civilian population. The government took some steps to investigate and address corruption of government officials.

In May, Minister of Finance Kyaw Win resigned while under investigation by the Anticorruption Commission. The investigation did not lead to charges.
In September the Yangon Region Attorney General and five other officials, including a judge, were arrested and charged with taking 70 million kyats ($45,500) in bribes to drop charges against three men accused of killing a popular comedian in January. The case continued as of October.

In October the Anti-corruption Commission chairman stated his commission has no authority to investigate corruption in the military.

Financial Disclosure: Public officials were not subject to public financial disclosure laws. The law requires the president and vice presidents to furnish a list of family assets to the speaker of the joint houses of parliament, and the law requires persons appointed by the president to furnish a list of personal assets to the president. The government did not make the reports available to the public.

Civil servants cannot accept gifts worth more than 25,000 kyats ($16). The rules also require civil servants to report all offers of gifts to their supervisors, whether or not they are accepted.

Section 5. Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Abuses of Human Rights

The government did not fully allow domestic human rights organizations to function independently. Human rights NGOs were able to open offices and operate, but there were some reports of harassment and monitoring by authorities, and that authorities sometimes pressured hotels and other venues not to host meetings by activists or other civil society groups.

Human rights activists and advocates, including representatives from international NGOs, continued to obtain short-term visas that required them to leave the country periodically for renewal. The government continued to monitor the movements of foreigners and interrogated citizens concerning contacts with foreigners.

The United Nations or Other International Bodies: As of year’s end, the government had not agreed to the opening of an Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). While formally allowing OHCHR staff to maintain a nominal presence in country, the government delayed visa issuance for some OHCHR staff members and continued to require travel authorization for travel to Rakhine State and conflict areas.
On September 17, the UN Fact-Finding Mission, established by the UN Human Rights Council, published its final report on the country, which detailed atrocities committed by the military in Rakhine, Kachin, and Shan States, as well as other areas, and characterized the “genocidal intent” of the military’s 2017 operations in Rakhine State. The government denied the Fact-Finding Mission permission to enter the country and publicly disavowed the report.

The government continued not to allow the UN special rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Myanmar to enter the country, but permitted UN special envoy of the Secretary-General on Myanmar Christine Schraner Burgener, who was appointed in April, to enter the country on multiple occasions and meet with officials, including Aung San Suu Kyi and Commander-in-Chief Minh Aung Hlaing.

The ICRC had full access to independent civilian prisons and labor camps. The government also allowed the ICRC to operate in ethnic-minority states, including in Shan, Rakhine, and Kachin States.

Government Human Rights Bodies: The Myanmar National Human Rights Commission investigated some incidents of gross human rights abuses. In some prominent cases, it called on the government to conduct investigations into abuses, and in October it called on the government to facilitate the repatriation of Rohingya from Bangladesh. It also conducted investigations into police mistreatment of detainees (see section 1.d., Arrest Procedures and Treatment of Detainees). Its ability to operate as a credible, independent mechanism remained limited. The commission supported the development of human rights education curricula, distributed human rights materials, and conducted human rights training.

On July 30, the government announced the formation of the Commission of Enquiry (COE) for Rakhine State, headed by Rosario Manalo, a former deputy prime minister of the Philippines. The four-person COE did not release any findings as of October. Previous government-led investigations into reports of widespread abuses by security services against the Rohingya in northern Rakhine State in 2016 yielded no findings of guilt or accountability and were criticized by international observers as deeply flawed.

The Advisory Commission on Rakhine State, established by Aung San Suu Kyi in 2016 and led by former UN secretary-general Kofi Annan, released its final report in August 2017, prior to the ARSA attacks in northern Rakhine State. Observers questioned the government’s claim to have implemented 81 of 88 recommendations in the Advisory Commission’s final report as of October.

Section 6. Discrimination, Societal Abuses, and Trafficking in Persons

Women

Rape and Domestic Violence: Rape is illegal but remained a significant problem, and the government did not enforce the law effectively. Spousal rape is not a crime unless the wife is younger than 14 years. Police generally investigated reported cases of rape, but there were reports police investigations were not sensitive to victims. Civil society groups continued to report police in some cases verbally abused women who reported rape, and women could be sued for impugning the dignity of the perpetrator.

Domestic violence against women, including spousal abuse, remained a serious problem. Abuse within families was prevalent and considered socially acceptable. Spousal abuse or domestic violence was difficult to measure because the government did not maintain comprehensive statistics and victims typically did not report it, although the government attempted to document cases and stated cases were on the rise. Laws prohibit committing bodily harm against another person, but there are no laws specifically against domestic violence or spousal abuse unless the wife is younger than 14. Punishment for violating the law includes sentences ranging from one year to life in prison, in addition to possible fines. Overlapping and at times contradictory legal provisions complicated implementation of these limited protections.

The United Nations, media, and NGOs during the year documented the widespread use of rape and sexual violence by the military in Rakhine, Kachin, and Shan States since at least 2011. The military rejected all allegations that rape was an institutionalized practice in the military.

Sexual Harassment: The penal code prohibits sexual harassment and imposes a maximum of one year’s imprisonment and a fine for verbal harassment and a maximum of two years’ imprisonment and a fine for physical contact. There was no information on the prevalence of the problem because these crimes were largely unreported. Local civil society organizations reported police investigators were not sensitive to victims and rarely followed through with investigations or prosecutions.
Coercion in Population Control: There were no reports of coerced abortion or involuntary sterilization. In 2015, however, the government enacted the Population Control and Health Care Law, which contains provisions that, if enforced, could impose coercive birth-spacing requirements. Under the law the president or the national government may designate “special regions” for health care following consideration of factors such as population, natural resources, birth rates, and food availability. Once a special region is declared, the government allows the creation of special health-care organizations to perform various tasks, including establishing regulations related to family planning methods. The government has not designated any such special regions since the law’s enactment.

A two-child local order issued by the government of Rakhine State pertaining to the Rohingya population in two northern townships remained in effect, but the government and NGOs reported it was not consistently enforced (see section 1.f.).

Discrimination: By law women enjoy the same legal status and rights as men, including property and inheritance rights and religious and personal status, but it was not clear the government enforced the law. The law requires equal pay for equal work, but it was not clear the formal sector respected this requirement. NGOs reported some sectors, such as the garment industry, did not comply. Poverty affected women disproportionately. The law governing hiring of civil service personnel states nothing shall prevent the appointment of men to “positions that are suitable for men only,” with no further definition of what constitutes positions “suitable for men only.”

Customary law was widely used to address issues of marriage, property, and inheritance, and it differs from the provisions under statutory law.

Children

Birth Registration: The 1982 Citizenship Law automatically confers full citizenship status to 135 recognized national ethnic groups as well as to persons who met citizenship requirements under previous citizenship legislation. Moreover, the government confers full citizenship to second-generation children of both parents with any citizenship, as long as at least one parent has full citizenship. Third-generation children of associate or naturalized citizens can acquire full citizenship. Residents derive full citizenship through parents, both of whom must be one of the 135 officially recognized “national races.” Under the law the government does not officially recognize Rohingya as an ethnic group.
A prominent international NGO noted significant rural-urban disparities in birth registration. In major cities (e.g., Rangoon and Mandalay), births were registered immediately. In larger cities parents must register births to qualify for basic public services and obtain national identification cards. In smaller towns and villages, however, birth registration often was informal or nonexistent. For the Rohingya community, birth registration was a significant problem (see section 2.d.). The Advisory Commission on Rakhine State noted in its interim report nearly one-half of all residents in Rakhine State lacked birth documentation and recommended the government introduce a comprehensive birth registration campaign.

A birth certificate provided important protections for children, particularly against child labor, early marriage, and recruitment into the armed forces and armed groups. Sometimes a lack of birth registration, but more often a lack of availability, complicated access to public services in remote communities.

Education: By law, education is compulsory, free, and universal through the fourth grade. The government continued to allocate minimal resources to public education, and schools charged informal fees.

Education access for internally displaced and stateless children remained limited.

Child Abuse: Laws prohibit child abuse, but they were neither adequate nor enforced. NGOs reported corporal punishment was widely used against children as a means of discipline. The punishment for violations is a maximum of two years’ imprisonment or a maximum fine of 10,000 kyats ($6.30). There was anecdotal evidence of violence against children occurring within families, schools, in situations of child labor and exploitation, and in armed conflict. The Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief, and Resettlement continued its child protection programs. In Rakhine State continued violence left many families and children displaced or with restrictions on their movement, and this dislocation at times exposed them to an environment of violence and exploitation. Armed conflict in Kachin and Shan States had a similar adverse effect on children in those areas.

Early and Forced Marriage: The law stipulates different minimum ages for marriage based on religion and gender: The minimum age for Buddhists is 18 years, and the minimum age for Christians is 16 for boys and 15 for girls, but child marriage still occurred. According to the 2014 census, more than 13 percent of women married between ages 15 and 19. There were no reliable statistics on forced marriage. Child marriage remained a problem in rural areas.
Sexual Exploitation of Children: Children were subjected to sex trafficking in the country, and a small number of foreign child-sex tourists exploited children. The law does not explicitly prohibit child-sex tourism, but it prohibits pimping and prostitution, and the penal code prohibits sex with a minor younger than 14 years. The penalty for the purchase and sale of commercial sex acts from a child younger than 18 is 10 years’ imprisonment. The law prohibits pornography and specifies a penalty of two years’ minimum imprisonment and a fine of 10,000 kyats ($6.30). If a victim is younger than 14, the law considers the sexual act statutory rape. The maximum sentence for statutory rape is two years’ imprisonment when the victim is between 12 and 14, and 10 years’ to life imprisonment when the victim is younger than 12.

Displaced Children: The mortality rate of internally displaced children in conflict areas was significantly higher than in the rest of the country (see section 2.d.). The United Nations estimated that 53 percent of the 128,000 IDPs in Rakhine State are children; the vast majority of this population is Rohingya. The UN estimated that 46 percent of the 98,000 IDPs in Kachin State are children and 48 percent of the 8,500 IDPs in northern Shan State are children.

Anti-Semitism

There was one synagogue in Rangoon serving a small Jewish congregation. There were no reports of anti-Semitic acts.

Trafficking in Persons

See the Department of State’s Trafficking in Persons Report at www.state.gov/j/tip/rls/tiprpt/.

Persons with Disabilities

The law prohibits discrimination against persons with physical, sensory, hearing, intellectual, and mental disabilities. The law does not specifically prohibit discrimination against persons with disabilities in air travel and other forms of transportation, but it directs the government to assure that persons with disabilities have easy access to public transportation. The government did not effectively enforce these provisions.

Civil society groups reported that children with disabilities often attended school through secondary education at a significantly lower rate than other persons, and many never attended school due to stigma and lack of any accommodation for their needs.

According to the Myanmar Physical Handicap Association, a significant number of military personnel, armed group members, and civilians had a disability because of conflict, including because of torture and landmine incidents. There were approximately 12,000 amputees in the country--two-thirds believed to be landmine survivors--supported by five physical rehabilitation centers throughout the country. Persons with disabilities reported stigma, discrimination, and abuse from civilian and government officials. Students with disabilities cited barriers to inclusive education as a significant disadvantage.

Military veterans with disabilities received official benefits on a priority basis, usually a civil service job at equivalent pay, but both military and ethnic-minority survivors in rural areas typically did not have access to livelihood opportunities or affordable medical treatment. Official assistance to nonmilitary persons with disabilities in principle included two-thirds of pay for a maximum of one year for a temporary disability and a tax-free stipend for permanent disability. While the law provides job protection for workers who become disabled, authorities did not implement it.

National/Racial/Ethnic Minorities

Ethnic minorities constituted 30 to 40 percent of the population. The seven ethnic minority states composed approximately 60 percent of the national territory, and significant numbers of minorities also resided within the country’s other regions. Wide-ranging governmental and societal discrimination against minorities persisted, including in areas such as education, housing, employment, and access to health services. International observers noted significant wage discrepancies based on religious and ethnic backgrounds were common.

Burmese generally remained the mandatory language of instruction in government schools. The government’s National Education Strategic Plan, released in April 2017, did not cover issues related to mother-tongue instruction. In schools controlled by ethnic groups, students sometimes had no access to the national curriculum. There were very few domestic publications in indigenous-minority languages.

Tension between the military and ethnic minority populations, while somewhat diminished in areas with cease-fire agreements, remained high, and the military stationed forces in some ethnic groups’ areas of influence and controlled certain cities, towns, and highways. Ethnic armed groups, including the Kachin Independence Organization and the Karen National Union, pointed to the increased presence of army troops as a major source of tension and insecurity. Reported abuses included killings, beatings, torture, forced labor, forced relocations, and rapes of members of ethnic groups by government soldiers. Some groups also committed abuses (see section 1.g.).

The Rohingya in Rakhine State faced severe discrimination based on their ethnicity. Most Rohingya faced extreme restrictions on their ability to travel, avail themselves of health-care services, engage in economic activity (see section 7.d.), obtain an education, and register births, deaths, and marriages (see section 2.d.). Most of those displaced in 2012 remained confined to semipermanent camps with severely limited access to education, health care, and livelihoods.

The military and other security forces committed widespread atrocities against Rohingya villagers starting in August 2017 that were documented during the year, including extrajudicial killings, rape, torture, arbitrary arrest, and burning of hundreds of villages, religious structures, and other buildings. These atrocities and associated events forced more than 700,000 Rohingya to flee to Bangladesh as of September and constituted ethnic cleansing against the Rohingya.

Acts of Violence, Discrimination, and Other Abuses Based on Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity

Political reforms in recent years made it easier for the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and intersex (LGBTI) community to hold public events and openly participate in society, yet discrimination, stigma and a lack of acceptance among the general population persisted. Consensual same-sex sexual activity remains illegal under the penal code, which contains a provision against “unnatural offenses” with a penalty of a maximum of 10 years’ imprisonment and a fine. Laws against “unnatural offenses” apply equally to both men and women; these laws were rarely enforced. LGBTI persons reported police used the threat of prosecution to extort bribes. While the penal code is used more for coercion or bribery, LGBTI persons, particularly transgender women, were most frequently charged under so-called shadow and disguise laws. These laws use the justification that a person dressed or acting in a way that is perceived as not being in line with their biological gender is in “disguise.” According to a report by a local NGO, transgender women reported higher levels of police abuse and discrimination than other members of the LGBTI community.

In March, authorities in Rangoon used the “unnatural offenses” law to charge an openly gay restaurant owner for allegedly sexually assaulting a male member of his staff. The case was pending at year’s end.

There were reports of discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity in employment. LGBTI persons reported facing discrimination from medical-care providers.

HIV and AIDS Social Stigma

The constitution provides for the individual’s right to health care in accordance with national health policy, prohibits discrimination by the government on the grounds of “status,” and requires equal opportunity in employment and equality before the law. Persons with HIV/AIDS could theoretically submit a complaint to the government if a breach of their constitutional rights or denial of access to essential medicines occurred, such as antiretroviral therapy, but there were no reports of individuals submitting complaints on these grounds. There are no HIV-specific protective laws or laws that specifically address the human rights aspects of HIV.

There were continued reports of societal violence and discrimination, including employment discrimination, against persons with HIV/AIDS. Negative incidents such as exclusion from social gatherings and activities; verbal insults, harassment, and threats; and physical assaults continued to occur. Laws that criminalize behaviors linked to an increased risk of acquiring HIV/AIDS remain in place, directly fueling stigma and discrimination against persons engaged in these behaviors and impeding their access to HIV prevention, treatment, and care services.

High levels of social stigma and discrimination against female sex workers and transgender women hindered their access to HIV prevention, treatment, and social protection services. Police harassment of sex workers deterred the workers from carrying condoms.
Other Societal Violence or Discrimination

There were reports of other cases of societal violence, and anti-Muslim sentiment and discrimination persisted. Members of Buddhist nationalist groups, including members of Ma Ba Tha, continued to denigrate Islam and called for a boycott of Muslim businesses.

Muslim communities complained about unequal treatment by police, pressures to practice Islam in private, difficulty in obtaining citizenship cards, close monitoring of their travel by local government, and restrictions on education opportunities. In addition some Muslims reported discrimination by private parties in renting housing. Religious groups noted the January 2017 assassination of Ko Ni had a chilling effect on Muslims fighting for improved treatment under the law (see section 1.a.).

Anti-Muslim hate speech, and in particular anti-Rohingya hate-speech, was prevalent on social media, in particular Facebook, the most popular social media platform in Myanmar. Independent reporting indicated that the military, using false accounts, was also responsible for generating and promulgating hate speech content.

Multiple sources noted restrictions against Muslims and Christians impeded their ability to pursue higher education opportunities and assume high-level government positions and that Muslims were unable to invest and trade freely.

Section 7. Worker Rights

a. Freedom of Association and the Right to Collective Bargaining

The law provides for the right of workers to form and join independent unions, bargain collectively, and conduct legal strikes. The law permits labor organizations to demand the reinstatement of workers dismissed for union activity, but it does not explicitly prohibit antiunion discrimination in the form of demotions or mandatory transfers, nor does it offer protection for workers seeking to form a union. The law does not provide for adequate protections for workers from dismissal before a union is officially registered.

Laws prohibit personnel of the defense services, armed forces, and police force from forming unions. The law permits workers to join unions only within their category of trade or activity, and the definition of trade or activity lacks clarity. Basic labor organizations must have a minimum of 30 workers and register through township registrars with the chief registrar’s Office of the Ministry of Labor, Immigration, and Population (Ministry of Labor). Township labor organizations require a minimum of 10 percent of relevant basic labor organizations to register; regional or state labor organizations require a minimum of 10 percent of relevant township labor organizations. Each of these higher-level unions must include only organizations within the same trade or activity. Similarly, federations and confederations also require a minimum number of regional or state labor organizations (10 percent and 20 percent, respectively) from the next lower level in order to register formally. The law permits labor federations and confederations to affiliate with international union federations and confederations.

The law provides for voluntary registration for local NGOs, including NGOs working on labor issues. Organizations that choose to register are required to send organizational bylaws and formation documents to the government. Broader restrictions on freedom of assembly remained in place (see section 2.b.).

The law gives unions the right to represent workers, to negotiate and bargain collectively with employers, and to send representatives to a conciliation body or conciliation tribunal. The law permits unions to assist in individual disputes and individual employment agreements. The law does not contain detailed measures regarding management of the bargaining process, such as a duty to bargain in good faith, a period for bargaining, registration, or extension or enforcement of collective agreements. The National Tripartite Dialogue Forum (NTDF), with representatives of government, business, and labor, met three times during the year. The NDTF consults with parliament on revising legislation on freedom of association, collective bargaining, and dispute settlement resolution.

The law stipulates that disputes in special economic zones be settled in accordance with original contracts and existing laws. Under the law on special economic zones, the government appointed a labor inspector for each such zone and established zonal tripartite committees responsible for setting wage levels and monitoring the ratio of local and foreign labor.

The law provides for the right to strike in most sectors, with a majority vote by workers, permission of the relevant labor federations, and detailed information and three days’ advance notice provided to the employer and the relevant conciliation body. The law does not permit strikes or lockouts in essential services. For “public utility services” (including the transport; cargo and freight; postal; sanitation; information, communication, and technology; energy; petroleum; and financial sectors), lockouts are permitted with a minimum of 14 days’ notice provided to the relevant labor organizations and conciliation body. Strikes in public utility services require generally the same measures as in other sectors, but with 14 days’ advance notice and negotiation between workers and management before the strike takes place to determine maintenance of minimum service levels. The law prohibits strikes addressing problems not directly relevant to labor issues.

The law provides for a framework for the settlement of individual and collective disputes at the enterprise, township, regional, and national levels through conciliation or arbitration, but it lacks sufficient mechanisms for enforcement. The penalty for noncompliance with the settlement agreements called for in the law can be a fine of up to one million kyats ($650).

Labor groups reported their biggest challenge remained labor organizations’ inability to register at the national level, a prerequisite for entering labor framework agreements with multinational companies, due to the registration requirements under the law. In addition the International Labor Organization (ILO), labor activists, and media continued to report concerns employers subsequently fired or engaged in other forms of reprisal for workers who formed or joined labor unions. Trade unions reported cases in which criminal charges were filed against workers for exercising their right to strike. Labor organizations also reported local labor offices imposed unnecessary bureaucratic requirements for union registration that were inconsistent with the law.

Workers and workers’ organizations continued to report they generally found the Ministry of Labor to be helpful in urging employers to negotiate, but there were consistent reports of employers ignoring the negotiated agreements or engaging in other forms of antiunion discrimination.

b. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Laws prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labor and provide for the punishment of persons who impose forced labor on others, but the government did not effectively enforce the law.

The law provides for criminal penalties for forced labor violations; penalties differ depending on whether the military, the government, or a private citizen committed the violation. Prosecution of military perpetrators occurs under either the military or penal code. Civilian perpetrators may be subject to administrative action or criminal proceedings under the penal code. The maximum penalty under the penal code is 12 months in prison; under the military code it is seven years in prison. International observers deemed the penalties sufficient to deter forced labor.

The government continued to implement some aspects of the ILO action plan to eliminate forced labor and in January extended the Supplementary Understanding with the ILO, which provides for a complaint mechanism for victims of forced labor through the end of the year. The government also signed a memorandum of understanding with the ILO in January to create an action plan to eliminate forced labor, which provides for an additional complaint mechanism as well as training and awareness-raising activities on forced labor.

The ILO reported it continued to receive complaints of forced labor, although the number was decreasing overall. Though the military and the government received complaints logged by the complaints mechanism, there was no evidence that they took enforcement action to address concerns. There was no evidence that the government prosecuted soldiers in civilian courts for recruitment or use of child soldiers.

Reports of forced labor occurred across the country, including in conflict and cease-fire areas, and the prevalence was higher in states with significant armed conflict. Forced labor reports included forced portering and activities related to the military’s “self-reliance” policy. Under the self-reliance policy, military battalions are responsible for procuring their own food and labor supplies from local villagers—a major factor contributing to forced labor and other abuses.

Prisoners in the country’s 48 labor camps engaged in forced labor (see section 1.c., Prison and Detention Center Conditions).

The ILO received reports of forced labor in the private sector, including excessive overtime with or without compensation by workers at risk of losing their jobs and also by bonded labor. Domestic workers also remained at risk of domestic servitude.

Also see the Department of State’s Trafficking in Persons Report at www.state.gov/j/tip/rls/tiprpt/.

c. Prohibition of Child Labor and Minimum Age for Employment
The minimum age for work in shops, establishments, and factories is 14 years; the law establishes special provisions for “youth employment” for those older than 14. Employees from 16 to 18 must have a certificate to authorize them to carry out “work fit for an adult.” The law prohibits employees younger than 18 from working in a hazardous environment, but the government has not finalized a hazardous work list enumerating occupations in which child labor is specifically prohibited.

Trained inspectors from the Factories and General Labor Laws Inspection Department monitored the application of these regulations, including with regard to child labor, but their legal authority only extends to factories. In addition inspectors were hindered by a general lack of resources. A child-labor working group met regularly, chaired by the minister of labor with representatives from government departments, the private sector, labor unions, and civil society. On February 5 the government formed the National Committee for the Elimination of Child Labor and tasked a working group to draft a national plan of action to implement ILO Convention 182 on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labor.

The Ministry of Labor worked with other ministries to collect better data on existing child labor and continued a campaign directed at parents to raise awareness of the risks of child labor and provide information on other education options available to children. The Ministry of Labor engaged with the Ministry of Education on two programs, one aimed at bringing children out of the workplace and putting them in school, and another to support former child soldiers in pursuit of classroom education or vocational training. The labor ministry supported vocational schools to train young workers for jobs in nonhazardous environments.

The criminal penalties for recruiting child soldiers for military officials under martial law range from dismissal from service and imprisonment in civil prison to a fine of seven days’ pay (see section 1.g.). For civilians the law outlines penalties for child recruitment from a minimum 10 years’ to a maximum of life imprisonment. Penalties under the law and their enforcement for other child labor violations were insufficient to deter violations.

Child labor remained prevalent and highly visible. Children were at high risk, with poverty leading some parents to remove them from schools before completion of compulsory education. In cities children worked mostly as street vendors or refuse collectors, as restaurant and teashop attendants, and as domestic workers. Children also worked in the production of garments.
Children often worked in the informal economy, in some instances exposing them to drugs and petty crime, risk of arrest, commercial sexual exploitation, and HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted infections (also see section 6).

Children were vulnerable to forced labor in teashops, agriculture, and begging. In rural areas children routinely worked in family agricultural activities, occasionally in situations of forced labor.

d. Discrimination with Respect to Employment and Occupation

Labor laws and regulations do not specifically prohibit employment discrimination.

Women remained underrepresented in most traditionally male-dominated occupations (mining, forestry, carpentry, masonry, and fishing) and were effectively barred from certain professions.

There were reports government and private actors practiced anti-Muslim discrimination that impeded Muslim-owned businesses’ operations and negatively affected their ability to hire and retain labor, maintain proper working standards, and secure public and private contracts. There were reports of discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity in employment, including the denial of promotions and firing of LGBTI persons. Activists reported job opportunities for many openly gay and lesbian persons were limited, and they noted a general lack of support from society as a whole. Activists reported that in addition to general societal discrimination, persons with HIV/AIDS faced employment discrimination in both the public and private sectors, including suspensions and the loss of employment following positive results from mandatory workplace HIV testing.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The government raised the official minimum daily wage to 4,800 kyats ($3.15) from 3,600 kyats ($2.40), effective in May. The minimum wage covers a standard eight-hour workday across all sectors and industries and applies to all workers except for those in businesses with fewer than 15 employees. The law requires the minimum wage to be revised every two years. Labor unions and activists criticized the raise in the minimum wage as too small for workers to keep up with the rising cost of living.
The law requires employers to pay employees on the date the salary is due for companies with 100 or fewer employees. For companies with more than 100 employees, the employer is required to pay employees within five days from the designated payday. Overtime cannot exceed 12 hours per workweek, should not go past midnight, and can exceed 16 hours in a workweek only on special occasions. The law also stipulates that an employee’s total working hours cannot exceed 11 hours per day (including overtime and a one-hour break). The law applies to shops, commercial establishments, and establishments for public entertainment.

The Labor Dispute Law stipulates the terms and conditions required for occupational safety, health, welfare, and productivity, but information was limited about whether workers can remove themselves from situations that endanger their health or safety without jeopardizing their employment.

The Ministry of Labor’s Factories and General Labor Laws Inspection Department oversees labor conditions in the private sector. Both resources and capacity constrained enforcement. The number of labor law inspectors and factory inspectors under the ministry was insufficient to address adequately occupational safety and health standards, wage, salary, overtime, and other issues. In certain sectors other ministries regulated occupational safety and health laws (e.g., the Ministry of Agriculture, Livestock, and Irrigation).

In January the government and the ILO held the Third Labor Stakeholders’ Forum under the auspices of the multistakeholder Initiative to Promote Fundamental Labor Rights and Practices in Myanmar. The forum brought together more than 200 participants from the public and private sectors to discuss labor rights and various labor problems, including addressing freedom of association and collective bargaining, strengthening labor dispute settlement, and strengthening local capacity and institutions.

Enforcement of the laws generally took place in the public sector, but frequent violations occurred in private enterprises. Workers continued to submit complaints to relevant government agencies and the dispute settlement mechanism. Workers’ organizations alleged government inspections were rare and often announced with several days’ notice that allowed factory owners to bring facilities—often temporarily—into compliance. Corruption and bribery of inspectors reportedly occurred.
The social security board covers all employees in companies with more than five employees, with the exception of six sectors (government, international organizations, seasonal farming and fisheries, construction, nonprofit organizations, and domestic work). In practical terms the board covered primarily industrial zones, the location of the majority of registered workers, and therefore supported less than 1 percent of individuals involved in workplace accidents or casualties. While the board provided hospitals and clinics, it did not keep independently verifiable statistics on accidents or workplace violations. Observers assumed workers in other sectors of the economy had even less support, and no statistics on accidents or workplace violations were available.
EXHIBIT 5
BURMA 2017 HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Burma has a quasi-parliamentary system of government in which the national parliament selects the president and constitutional provisions grant one-quarter of parliamentary seats to active duty military appointees. The military also has the authority to appoint the ministers of defense, home affairs, and border affairs and one of two vice presidents, as well as to assume power over all branches of the government should the president declare a national state of emergency. In 2015 the country held nationwide parliamentary elections that the public widely accepted as a credible reflection of the will of the people. In 2016 parliament selected National League for Democracy (NLD) member Htin Kyaw as president and created the position of State Counsellor for NLD party leader Aung San Suu Kyi, formalizing her position as the civilian government’s de facto leader.

Under the constitution, civilian authorities have no authority over the security forces; armed forces Commander-in-Chief Senior General Min Aung Hlaing maintained effective control over the security forces.

Ethnic cleansing against the Rohingya minority in Rakhine State occurred during the year. In early August some security forces deployed throughout northern Rakhine State, committing enforced disappearances and arbitrary arrests and displacing villagers, the majority of whom were Rohingya. On August 25, the Arakan Rohingya Salvation Army (ARSA) claimed responsibility for coordinated attacks against 30 security outposts in northern Rakhine State, killing 12 security personnel. Augmented security forces, as well as local vigilante groups acting independently or in concert with security forces, then reportedly committed widespread atrocities against Rohingya villagers, including extrajudicial killings, disappearances, rape, torture, arbitrary arrest, and burning of tens of thousands of homes and some religious structures and other buildings. This displaced more than 655,000 Rohingya to neighboring Bangladesh as of December, as well as an unknown number within Rakhine State, and more than 20,000 villagers from other ethnic groups, many of whom were evacuated by the security forces.

In addition to the atrocities in Rakhine State, the most significant human rights issues included: arbitrary or unlawful killings; politically motivated arrests; authorities’ human rights violations against civilians in other ethnic minority areas and conflict zones, particularly in Kachin State and Shan State; continued harsh conditions in prisons and labor camps; restrictions on freedom of speech, assembly, and association, including intimidation and arrest of journalists; restrictions on freedom of religion; continued statelessness for some populations and severe restrictions on freedom of movement; criminalization of same-sex sexual activities, although the law was rarely enforced; and trafficking in persons, including forced labor of adults and children.

Although the government took some limited actions to prosecute or punish officials responsible for abuses, the vast majority of such abuses continued with impunity.

Some nonstate groups committed human rights abuses, including extrajudicial killings, forced labor of adults and children, and failure to protect civilians in conflict zones.

Section 1. Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Arbitrary Deprivation of Life and Other Unlawful or Politically Motivated Killings

There were many reports security forces committed arbitrary or unlawful killings (see also section 1.g.).

Security forces used excessive and sometimes lethal force against civilians. On May 17, police at a jade mine operated by military-owned Myanmar Economic Holdings Limited in Hkamti Township, Sagaing Division, reportedly opened fire without warning on a group of miners who had illegally entered the property, resulting in the deaths of four miners and injuries to additional miners.

In January, Ko Ni, a prominent Muslim lawyer, advocate for constitutional reform, and adviser to Aung San Suu Kyi, was shot and killed outside Yangon International Airport by an assassin identified as Kyi Lin. Kyi Lin also killed a taxi driver who tried to intervene. Authorities opened an investigation into the killings, which resulted in the arrest of four persons including a retired military officer, although the alleged prime conspirator, former military officer Win Khaing, reportedly remained at large. Civil society groups claimed police, who ultimately report to the military, intentionally underinvestigated the case. Civil society groups and religious groups noted Ko Ni’s death had a chilling effect on lawyers working for constitutional reform and accountability for military abuses, as well as on Muslims fighting for improved treatment.
In Rakhine State, following the August 25 coordinated attacks by ARSA, security forces, aided in some cases by vigilantes, reportedly committed arbitrary and unlawful killings against Rohingya villagers throughout northern Rakhine State. On August 30, in Tula Toli Village (also known as Min Gyi), security forces assigned to the army’s Western Command reportedly committed a massacre. One report indicated that all male Rohingya villagers who had not fled ahead of the military’s arrival, as well as some women and children, were unlawfully executed. The military and some government officials denied such abuses occurred and took no steps to seek accountability for the perpetrators.

The United Nations, media, human rights groups, and Bangladesh border authorities reported security forces planted land mines along the border of Bangladesh in northern Rakhine State in September, with some suggesting the mines were planted to prevent Rohingya refugees from returning. Sources alleged at least nine internally displaced persons (IDPs) died from wounds characteristic of landmine injuries while fleeing northern Rakhine State to Bangladesh.

The trial against the soldier who admitted to accidentally killing Gum Seng Aung in June 2016 in Myitkyina, Kachin State, continued to experience delays. There were no substantive updates during the year.

During the year there were multiple reports of alleged ARSA members killing civilians in northern Rakhine State for collaborating with the government; however, it appeared two of these reports were not credible. On August 1, the government reported “extremists” killed six ethnic Mro villagers in northern Rakhine State. Civil society organizations reported ARSA was not likely active in that village and suspected the deaths were related to methamphetamine trafficking. In September the government organized a trip for journalists to see the alleged mass graves of 45 Hindus whom the government said ARSA killed in northern Maungdaw Township on August 25, but civil society organizations and some local villagers were unable to corroborate the claim of the government, and other local villagers suggested instead they were killed by security forces or vigilante groups that were not associated with Rohingya.

Arbitrary and unlawful killings related to internal conflict also occurred (see section 1.g.).

b. Disappearance

There were many reports of disappearances by security forces.
In the weeks prior to the August 25 attacks, there were reports police arrested Rohingya men from 15 to 40 years old without charges or warrants due to purported links to ARSA, and several of those detained reportedly were not heard from since. Family members who went to police stations to inquire about their disappeared relatives’ whereabouts were not provided with any relevant information. On August 21, military soldiers and police officers reportedly arrested 10 persons from Tha Man Thar Village in Maungdaw Township. The military later released four and told family members of the other six that police knew nothing about their whereabouts. After August 25, the pace of enforced disappearances reportedly increased. The military and some government officials denied such abuses occurred and took no steps to seek accountability for the perpetrators.

Disappearances related to internal conflict also occurred (see section 1.g.).

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The law prohibits torture; however, members of security forces reportedly tortured, raped, beat, and otherwise abused prisoners, detainees, and other citizens and stateless persons in incidents not related to armed conflict. Such incidents occurred, for example, in Rakhine and Kachin States.

Security forces reportedly subjected detainees to harsh interrogation techniques designed to intimidate and disorient, including severe beatings and deprivation of food, water, and sleep. Human rights groups continued to report incidents of torture in ethnic minority areas. Authorities generally took no action to investigate incidents or punish alleged perpetrators.

There were widespread reports of torture of Rohingya villagers, including children, in northern Rakhine State, including beatings, rape, and killings in front of family members. Rifle butts were allegedly used to hit Rohingya villagers’ stomachs and heads, and refugee testimonials referred to the military, sometimes jointly with ethnic Rakhine Buddhists, breaking legs, arms, and ribs of fleeing Rohingya villagers.

In January a mobile phone video taken by a member of the security forces during clearance operations in northern Rakhine State in November 2016 and posted on YouTube showed police beating civilian Rohingya. The government launched an investigation into police misconduct. Police reportedly prosecuted four persons and demoted one officer for the abuses recorded in the video, but details regarding the results of any investigation were not made public.

There were widespread reports of rapes of Rohingya women, children, and at least one man in northern Rakhine State by military forces and Border Guard Police. Most documented rapes were gang rapes, and many were mass rapes. The UN special representative on sexual violence assessed sexual violence was used as a calculated tool of terror aimed at the extermination and removal of the Rohingya as a group. One woman from Chut Pyin Village (also known as Shoppara) reported five soldiers raped her on August 26, the day before her village was burned by security forces. She reported soldiers stabbed her in the side with a knife during the rape while threatening to shoot her. Authorities failed to conduct a credible investigation into these allegations.

Prison and Detention Center Conditions

Conditions in prisons and labor camps continued to be harsh due to overcrowding, degrading treatment, and inadequate access to medical care and basic needs, including food, shelter, and hygiene.

Physical Conditions: The Correctional Department operated an estimated 43 prisons and approximately 48 labor camps, officially called “agriculture and livestock breeding career training centers” and “manufacturing centers,” according to the government. More than 20,000 inmates were serving their sentences in these labor camps across the country, where prisoners could opt to serve a shortened period of their sentence in “hard labor,” which was considered by many as more desirable.

A human rights group and prominent international nongovernmental organization (NGO) estimated there were 60,000 prisoners--50,000 men and 10,000 women--held in separate facilities in prisons and labor camps. Juvenile detainees were estimated to be a few hundred. Overcrowding was reportedly a problem in many prisons and labor camps. Some prisons held pretrial detainees together with convicted prisoners. Authorities held some political prisoners separately from common criminals, but political prisoners who authorities arrested for problems related to land rights were generally held together with common criminals.

Medical supplies and bedding were often inadequate. Bedding sometimes consisted of a single mat, wooden platform, or laminated plastic sheet on a concrete floor. Prisoners did not always have access to potable water. In many cases family members had to supplement prisoners’ official rations with medicine and basic necessities. Inmates reportedly paid wardens for necessities, including clean water, prison uniforms, plates, cups, and utensils.

Detainees were unable to access adequate and timely medical care. Prisoners suffered from health problems, including malaria, heart disease, high blood pressure, tuberculosis, skin diseases, and stomach problems, resulting from unhygienic conditions and spoiled food. The prevalence of HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted infections in prisons reportedly remained high. Former prisoners also complained of poorly maintained physical structures that provided no protection from the elements and had rodent, snake, and mold infestation.

There were reports of custodial deaths due to health problems associated with prison conditions and lack of adequate and timely medical care.

Prison conditions in Rakhine State were reportedly among the worst, with hundreds of Rohingya, including, according to one media report, children as young as 10 years arbitrarily detained in prison and nonprison facilities, denied due process, and subjected to torture and abuse by Rakhine State prison and security officials.

Administration: Some prisons prevented full adherence to religious codes for prisoners, ostensibly due to space restrictions and security concerns. For example, imprisoned monks reported authorities denied them permission to observe Buddhist holy days, wear robes, shave their heads, or eat on a schedule compatible with the monastic code. Citing security considerations, authorities denied permission for Muslim prisoners to pray together as a group, as is the practice for Friday prayers and Ramadan. Prisoners and detainees could sometimes submit complaints to judicial authorities without censorship or negative repercussions. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) followed up with relevant authorities on allegations of inappropriate conditions.

Independent Monitoring: Although the ICRC had unfettered access to prisons, prisoners, and labor camps, it did not have access to military or nonprison detention sites. The ICRC reported its findings through a strictly confidential bilateral dialogue with prison authorities. These reports were neither public nor shared with any other party.

d. Arbitrary Arrest or Detention
The law does not specifically prohibit arbitrary arrest but requires permission of a court for detention of more than 24 hours. The government continued to use the Unlawful Associations Act to arrest persons, often in ethnic and religious minority areas, on an arbitrary basis.

The law allows authorities to extend sentences after prisoners complete their original sentence. The law allows authorities to order detention without charge or trial of anyone they believe is performing or might perform any act that endangers the sovereignty and security of the state or public peace and tranquility. The civilian government and the military continued to interpret these laws broadly and used them to detain activists, student leaders, farmers, journalists, political staff, and human rights defenders.

The government generally did not allow detainees to challenge the legal basis of their detention in court prior to the two-week pretrial detention period.

Role of the Police and Security Apparatus

The Ministry of Home Affairs, led by an active-duty military general who is nominated by the armed forces commander-in-chief in accordance with the constitution, oversees the Myanmar Police Force (MPF), which is largely responsible for law enforcement and maintenance of order, although the Defense Services Office of the Chief of Military Security Affairs also plays a significant role in the maintenance of law and order, particularly in conflict areas. As such, lines of authority for internal security may be blurred. For example, during the operations in Rakhine State beginning in August, military commanders assumed primary control over all security arrangements and appeared to wield considerable operational influence over the Border Guard Police, which are also overseen by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Starting in August the Border Guard Police reportedly committed atrocities against Rohingya villagers in northern Rakhine State, either as independent measures or in concert with military forces. Regional police were either unable or unwilling to protect Rohingya victims, although they reportedly offered protection to other ethnic groups and their property.

In conflict and some cease-fire areas, security forces continued to intimidate civilians through physical abuse and threats to livelihoods. Public information was unavailable about the results of any military investigations into such abuses, and security forces generally acted with impunity. Legal mechanisms exist to investigate abuses by security forces but were seldom used and generally perceived to be ineffective.

Outside of conflict and cease-fire areas, the MPF is the primary institution charged with internal security. While the MPF continued to make some progress in developing civilian policing capacity, a severe lack of resources and its close relationship with the military presented substantial challenges to effective policing. The MPF’s investigative capacity was generally rudimentary, although some MPF commanders recognized the benefits of leveraging assistance from the international community to improve specialized units’ ability to investigate serious crimes such as narcotics, trafficking in persons, and financial crimes. Some organizations noted a significant decrease under the new government of the pervasive and threatening influence security forces previously exerted on the lives of inhabitants, while others noted an increase in police surveillance and monitoring during the year.

Arrest Procedures and Treatment of Detainees

While the law generally requires warrants for searches and arrests, personnel from the Office of the Chief of Military Security Affairs and police reportedly conducted searches and made arrests at will.

Except in capital cases, the law does not grant detainees the right to consult an attorney or, if indigent, to have one provided by the state. The government amended the legal aid law in May to provide the public access to fair and equal legal aid based on international standards and to ensure legal aid workers could operate independently and with legal protection.

There is a functioning bail system, but bribery was a common substitute for bail. Bail is commonly offered in criminal cases, but defendants were often required to attend numerous pretrial hearings before bail was granted. In some cases the government held detainees incommunicado and refused detainees the right to consult a lawyer promptly.

Arbitrary Arrest: There were reports of arbitrary arrests. In December 2016 the military detained two affiliates of the Kachin Baptist Convention, Dumdaw Nawng Lat and Langjaw Gam Seng, in Mong Ko, Shan State; however, the military did not admit to holding the men until the end of January. The military detained the two men after they assisted a group of journalists in visiting a church in Mong Ko allegedly bombed by the military. After holding the men incommunicado for one month, the military accused them of supporting the Kachin Independence Army (KIA) and charged both men under Article 17(1) of the Unlawful Associations Act, which has historically been used to arrest arbitrarily members of ethnic minority groups. In March the military announced an additional charge of defamation based on an interview the men gave to an international media outlet alleging the military bombed civilians during the conflict. On October 27, authorities sentenced Dumdaw Nawng Lat to four years and three months’ imprisonment and Langjaw Gam Seng to two years and three months’ imprisonment.

In August authorities arrested former child soldier Aung Ko Htway for defaming the military following an August 10 interview he gave to an international media outlet detailing his experience as a former child soldier. He was detained in Insein Prison and denied bail on October 2. His trial continued at the end of the year.

In October, U Khaing Myo Htun, the Arakan Liberation Party deputy information officer who in 2016 published a statement accusing the military of forced labor and using human shields in Rakhine State, was found guilty and sentenced to 18 months in prison, leaving three months remaining from the 15 months he had already spent in detention.

Pretrial Detention: By law suspects may be held in pretrial detention for two weeks (with a possible two-week extension) without bringing them before a judge or informing them of the charges against them. Lawyers noted police regularly detained suspects for the legally mandated period, failed to lodge a charge, then detained them for a series of two-week periods with trips to the judge in between. Judges and police sometimes colluded to extend detentions. According to lawyers, arbitrary and lengthy pretrial detentions resulted from lengthy legal procedures, large numbers of detainees, judicial inefficiency, widespread corruption, and staff shortages. Periods of detention prior to and during trials sometimes equaled or exceeded the sentence that would result from a guilty conviction.

Amnesty: On May 24, President Htin Kyaw pardoned and the government released 259 prisoners, including 64 whom the Assistance Association for Political Prisoners-Burma considered political prisoners. Among those released were Muslim interfaith activists Zaw Zaw Latt and Pwint Phyu Latt; Hla Phone, who criticized the military on Facebook; and eight of the 12 men arrested in 2014 under the now repealed Emergency Provisions Act for being members of the apparently nonexistent Myanmar Muslim Army.
e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The law calls for an independent judiciary, although there are also legal provisions that allow the government to manipulate the courts for political ends, and these provisions were sometimes used to deprive citizens of due process and the right to a fair trial, particularly with regards to the freedom of expression. Institutional corruption in the judicial system was a problem, and it sometimes appeared the judiciary was under the de facto control of the military or government. According to studies by civil society organizations, officials at all levels received extralegal payments at all stages in the legal process for purposes ranging from routine matters, such as access to a detainee in police custody to fixing the outcome of a case. The Office of the Supreme Court of the Union published a 2016 annual report on disciplinary actions taken against judges and court staff. Although no legal action was taken against judges for corruption, warnings were issued against 25 township court judges and 23 district court judges.

Trial Procedures

The law provides for the right to a fair and public trial, but it also grants broad exceptions, effectively allowing the government to violate these rights at will. In ordinary criminal cases, the court generally respected some basic due process rights such as the right to an independent judiciary, public access to the courts, and the right to a defense and an appeal. Defendants do not enjoy the rights to presumption of innocence; to be informed promptly and in detail of the charges against them; to be present at their trial; to free interpretation; or, except in capital cases, to consult an attorney of their choice or have one provided at government expense. There is no right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defense, but defense attorneys in criminal cases generally had 15 days to prepare for trial. Defendants have the right to appeal judgments, but in most appellate hearings, the original verdicts were upheld. No legal provision allows for the compelled testimony or confessions of guilt by defendants to be used in court; nonetheless, authorities reportedly engaged in both. There were reports of coercion to plead guilty with promises of reduced sentences to defendants who did so.

Ordinary criminal cases were open to the public, but in practice members of the public with no direct involvement in a case were denied entry to courts. There is no right to confront witnesses and present evidence, although defense attorneys could sometimes call witnesses and conduct cross-examinations. Prodemocracy activists generally appeared able to retain counsel, but defendants’ access to counsel was often inadequate. There were reports of authorities not informing family members of the arrests of persons in a timely manner, not telling them of their whereabouts, and often denying them the right to see prisoners in a timely manner. Local civil society groups noted the public was largely unaware of its legal rights, and there were insufficient lawyers to meet public needs.

The government retained the ability to extend prison sentences under the law. The minister of home affairs has the authority to extend a prison sentence unilaterally by two months on six separate occasions, for a total extension of one year.

Political Prisoners and Detainees

The government continued to detain and arrest journalists, activists, and critics of the government and the military during the year. According to civil society groups who use a definition of political prisoners that includes those that may have engaged in acts of violence and excludes some charges related to freedom of expression and religion, there were 45 convicted political prisoners, 49 political prisoners in pretrial detention or detained with trials in process, and 127 individuals released on bail while facing trial for political charges as of October. These numbers did not include detainees and prisoners in Rakhine State, estimated to be in the hundreds, many of whom likely meet the definition of political prisoner.

Many released political prisoners experienced significant surveillance and restrictions following their release, including an inability to resume studies undertaken prior to incarceration, secure travel documents, or obtain other documents related to identity or ownership of land. Under the code of criminal procedure, released political prisoners faced the prospect of serving the remainder of their sentences if rearrested for any reason.

Civil Judicial Procedures and Remedies

No specific mechanisms or laws provide for civil remedies for human rights violations; however, complainants may use provisions of the penal code and laws of civil procedure to seek civil remedies. Individuals and organizations may not appeal an adverse decision to regional human rights bodies.

Property Restitution

Under the constitution the state owns all land; however, the law allows for registration and sale of private land ownership rights. Authorities and private-sector organizations perpetrated land grabs during the year, and restitution for past land grabs was very limited.

The 2016 land use policy emphasizes the recognition, protection, and registration of legitimate land tenure rights of smallholders, communities, ethnic nationalities, women, and other vulnerable groups. It also includes the recognition, protection, and ultimate registration of customary tenure rights, which previously were not legally recognized. The law allows the government to declare land unused and assign it to foreign investors or designate it for other uses. There is no provision for judicial review of land ownership or confiscation decisions under either law; administrative bodies subject to political control by the national government make final decisions on land use and registration. Civil society groups raised concerns the laws do not recognize rights in traditional collective land ownership and shifting cultivation systems, which are particularly prevalent in areas inhabited by ethnic minority groups. Acquisition of privately owned land by the government remained governed by the 1894 Land Acquisition Act, which provides for compensation when the government acquires land for a public purpose. Civil society groups criticized the lack of safeguards in the law to provide payment of fair market compensation.

Researchers had concerns that land laws, including the Farmland Law and the Vacant, Fallow, and Virgin Land Law, facilitate land confiscation without providing adequate procedural protections. Parallel legal frameworks and traditional forms of land tenure in areas controlled by ethnic groups in Kachin, Mon, Kayin, and Shan States may not have formal legal recognition under the land laws.

Parliament’s Land Acquisition Investigation Commission did not have legal authority to implement and enforce recommendations in its 2013 report to return thousands of acres of confiscated but unused land or provide compensation to farmers from whom the government took the land, and media sources reported little progress in returning confiscated lands. The law requires land be returned if not used productively within four years, but civil society groups reported land taken by the military was left unused for much longer periods.

The General Administrative Department under the Ministry of Home Affairs, one of the ministries whose minister is appointed by the military, oversees land return. During the year there were at least four cases of previously confiscated land being returned to farmers. Adequate compensation was not provided to the many farmers and rural communities whose land was confiscated without due process during the former military regime, including by the Myanmar Oil and Gas Enterprise, the Myanmar Ports Authority, and the military.

f. Arbitrary or Unlawful Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The law protects the privacy and security of the home and property, but observers said these protections were poorly enforced.

The law does not protect the privacy of correspondence or other communications of citizens, and activists reported authorities had expanded surveillance of civil society organizations’ operations. Beginning on March 31, the government enforced registration requirements for all SIM cards and consequently blocked six million unregistered SIM cards. Mobile subscribers must provide their name, a copy of their identification, date of birth, address, gender, and nationality in order to register their SIM card.

Some activists reported the government systematically monitored the travel of citizens and closely monitored the activities of politically active persons, while others reported they did not experience any such invasions of privacy. The government reportedly conducted surveillance in some circumstances by using the Special Branch police, official intelligence networks, and other administrative procedures (see section 2.d.).

A 1998 Supreme Court directive prohibits legal officials from accepting petitions for marriages and from officiating at marriages between Burmese women and foreign men. The directive was sporadically enforced.

In Rakhine State local authorities prohibited Rohingya families from having more than two children, although this prohibition was inconsistently enforced. Also in Rakhine State, local authorities required members of the Rohingya minority to obtain a permit to marry officially, a step not required of other ethnicities. Waiting times for the permit could exceed one year, and bribes usually were required. According to human rights organizations, in April 2016 Border Guard Police in Buthidaung Township issued new instructions to village administrators outlining additional requirements for members of the Rohingya community to obtain a permit to marry. The new required documents included: a letter from the district immigration authorities verifying the couple were of legal age to marry; a letter from a station commander showing the couple was free of criminal offenses; a letter from a health assistant assuring the couple was free of communicable diseases; and a letter from village administrators confirming the individuals were single, unmarried, and that any previous marriage was dissolved at least three years prior. Unauthorized marriages could result in prosecution of Rohingya men under the penal code, which prohibits a man from “deceitfully” marrying a woman, and could result in a prison sentence or fine.

g. Abuses in Internal Conflict

Human rights abuses in Rakhine State outside the scope of armed conflict are noted in other sections throughout this report.

Incidents involving use of excessive force and other abuses in conjunction with long-running internal armed conflicts occurred across the country but varied widely. In Chin State and most of the southeast, widespread and systematic violent abuses of civilian populations in ethnic minority areas continued to decline, largely due to a number of bilateral cease-fire agreements reached with ethnic armed groups. These areas also broadly fall under the Nationwide Ceasefire Agreement (NCA) signed by eight ethnic armed groups in 2015. In Kachin State and parts of Shan State, clashes among NCA signatory, nonsignatory groups, and the military continued, with credible allegations of abuse of civilian populations by both the military and ethnic armed groups. The majority of such clashes occurred in northern Shan and Kachin States. In central and southern Rakhine State and southern Chin State, sporadic clashes between the Arakan Army and the military continued, and in early August, the Arakan Army clashed with the Arakan Liberation Party. In Shan State the military clashed with the Ta’ang National Liberation Army (TNLA) and the Restoration Council of Shan State (RCSS), even though the latter is an NCA signatory. Fighting between the RCSS and TNLA also continued. Both of these groups, and the military, were alleged to have abducted, tortured, and killed suspected combatants as well as burned villages.

In Kachin and Shan States, continuing armed clashes between the military and ethnic armed groups displaced thousands of persons, compounding long-term displacement of conflict-affected communities in these areas. The military blocked humanitarian access to ethnic armed group-controlled areas, where many of the displaced resided, and NGOs reported the military at times fired into IDP camps.

In mid-December the military launched air strikes against several KIA outposts in Kachin State, including around the KIA headquarters of Laiza. At least one civilian was reportedly killed in the fighting, and many IDPs were forced to flee.
On December 24, the military launched heavy artillery near Laiza that landed on nearby IDP camps and injured one woman.

The military continued to station forces in most ethnic armed groups’ areas of influence and controlled most cities, towns, and highways. Reports continued of widespread abuses by government soldiers and some ethnic armed groups, including killings, beatings, torture, forced labor, forced relocations, and the use of child soldiers. The military was also accused of rapes of members of ethnic minority groups in Shan, Kachin, and Rakhine States. Impunity for these abuses and crimes continued.

Killings: Military officials reportedly killed, tortured, and otherwise seriously abused civilians in conflict areas without public inquiry or accountability. Following ethnic armed groups’ attacks on the military, the military reportedly exercised a harsh form of collective punishment against civilians. The military’s use of indiscriminate force, including during aerial bombing, also resulted in civilian deaths. Some ethnic armed groups, most notably the RCSS and TNLA, allegedly killed civilians suspected of being members of rival armed groups. Clashes between government forces and ethnic armed groups broke out periodically in northern and southern Shan State during the year.

On May 25, soldiers from Battalion 319 shot and killed Nhkum Gam Awng, Maran Brang Seng, and Labya Naw Hkum, from Mai Hkawng Roman Catholic IDP camp in Mansi Township, Kachin State. According to camp officials, soldiers arrested the men while they were collecting firewood. NGOs reported villagers found the buried bodies on May 28. On September 15, the military invited villagers to observe court proceedings for six soldiers involved in the killings. Five soldiers reportedly pled guilty, while the battalion commander reportedly pled not guilty. The verdict and sentencing remained pending at year’s end.

On August 9, photographs of the dismembered bodies of Hpaukap Naw Lat and Labang Naw Bawk near a military outpost near Namti, Kachin State, circulated on social media. The men’s families contacted local military personnel, who said the men died while attempting to plant a land mine. The military accused the men of being members of the KIA. Local villagers reported, however, the men picked up the land mine to use while fishing. Several villagers reported witnessing military personnel detain the two men near Namti on the evening of August 8. Witnesses heard explosions in the morning of August 9. Authorities allegedly refused to allow family members to see the bodies before the military buried them. The police did not open an investigation.
Abductions: There were reports government soldiers abducted villagers in conflict areas. In Shan State human rights organizations alleged the military detained seven villagers, including a seven-year-old boy, on July 18, in retaliation against a village following a military confrontation with the RCSS.

Physical Abuse, Punishment, and Torture: NGO reports documented the military’s torture and beating of civilians alleged to be working with or perceived to be sympathetic to ethnic armed groups in Kachin and Shan States. There were also continued reports of forced labor and forced recruitment by the KIA.

Prominent civil society groups reported the military committed numerous crimes of sexual violence against ethnic women and girls in ethnic states.

The military continued to take steps to cease forcing civilians to serve as military porters, yet unconfirmed reports continued that the military forced civilians to carry supplies or serve in other support roles in areas with outbreaks of conflict, such as northern Shan, Rakhine, and Kachin States.

Civilians, armed actors, and NGOs operating inside the country and along the border reported continued landmine use by the military and armed groups. Although the government and ethnic armed groups continued to discuss joint demining action, the discussions did not result in any joint landmine activities. The military unilaterally undertook limited landmine clearance operations in the southeast and in northern Shan State where it cleared small numbers of improvised explosive devices and unexploded ordnance when identified.

The Department of Social Welfare (DSW) and UNICEF continued to cochair the one national and four state-level Mine Risk Working Groups (MRWG) in Kachin, Kayah, Kayin, and Shan States. In Kayin State the MRWG included representatives from the DSW, national MRWG, military, and ethnic armed groups, including the Karen National Union (KNU), Democratic Karen Benevolent Army, and Karen National Liberation Army-Peace Council. In March the DSW facilitated a meeting between the Directorate of Military Engineers and six demining NGOs to discuss support for demining activities from the international community.

The MRWG coordinated mine risk education, victim assistance, information management systems, and advocacy. MRWG members monitored and documented incidents and casualties from land mines and unexploded remnants of war. As of September, UNICEF reported 124 casualties, including 38 children. Many incidents were not reported due to continuing conflicts in Kachin, Shan, and Rakhine States.

Child Soldiers: There was limited progress in implementing the 2012 joint plan of action between the government and the United Nations to end recruitment of child soldiers and to demobilize and rehabilitate those serving in the armed forces. The United Nations reported that progress on implementation had stalled since May, and there were reports that the military and its middlemen continued to recruit child soldiers from large cities such as Rangoon and Mandalay. The UN Country Task Force on Monitoring and Reporting (CTFMR)--the official mechanism for monitoring and reporting grave violations against children--continued its work with the government, as required by the memorandum of understanding between the United Nations and the government. The CFTMR met quarterly and submitted quarterly reports to the Security Council. Its last meeting was on December 15. During the year it received 15 complaints of child soldier recruitment. Normal verification procedures could take up to six months to confirm, and none of the 15 cases had yet completed verification. CFTMR monitoring was limited in part because of limitations on UN access to conflict-affected areas. During the year the government released 49 child soldiers identified within the military’s ranks. The military continued identifying suspected cases in addition to those reported by the CTFMR to the military. The CTFMR received these reports through its hotline, the forced-labor complaint mechanism, and community-based networks. Children who fled military service or received demobilization from civil society organizations rather than through the official CTFMR process continued to face arrest and imprisonment on charges of desertion while the military investigated their cases. Some children who previously were demobilized through the official CTFMR process had been re-recruited by the military once they were of legal age.

The Ministry of Defense undertook efforts to investigate and punish military personnel for recruitment of child soldiers. During the year the military punished 19 officers for previous recruitment of child soldiers. UN experts noted only low-level soldiers were held accountable, despite involvement by higher-level personnel.

The military continued enforcing its ban of all recruitment at the battalion level and continued to sanction military officers and noncommissioned personnel for complicity in child soldier recruitment and use. Former child soldiers generally did not receive meaningful reintegration support, although the military began working with the Union of Myanmar Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry, the country’s national chamber of commerce, to help develop the reintegration program for child soldiers to include private-sector opportunities. The military also provided information to the CTFMR that linked specific accountability measures to the respective case(s) of child recruitment or use, allowing for verification of the military’s accountability measures. The military did not make these reports available to the public.

The United Nations reported the government continued upholding its commitment under the action plan to allow UN monitors to inspect for compliance with agreed-upon procedures, to cease recruitment of children, and to implement processes for identification and demobilization of those serving in armed conflict. Nonetheless, UN monitors complained of insufficient access, noting that travel authorizations were often not granted until three or more months after an application was submitted, which complicated the United Nation’s ability to investigate claims effectively. They also noted that access to conflict areas was generally denied.

The Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief, and Resettlement (MSWRR), UNICEF, and other partners provided social assistance and reintegration support to discharged children.

Military officials, in cooperation with the CTFMR, continued training military officers, including recruitment officers and officers up to the rank of captain, on international humanitarian law. UNICEF trained personnel assigned to the country’s four recruitment hubs and reported increased numbers of prospective child soldiers rejected at this stage.

Ethnic armed groups reportedly continued to use forced recruitment and child soldiers and sometimes demanded ransom to release child soldiers. Human rights groups reported ethnic armed groups known to recruit and use child soldiers included the KIA, Democratic Karen Benevolent Army, Karen National Liberation Army, Karen National Liberation Army-Peace Council, Karenni Army, Shan State Army South, and the United Wa State Army. The government continued to prevent ethnic armed groups from signing joint plans of action with the United Nations to end recruitment of child soldiers and to demobilize and rehabilitate those already serving.

Also see the Department of State’s Trafficking in Persons Report at www.state.gov/j/tip/rls/tiprpt/.
Other Conflict-related Abuse: The government restricted the passage of relief supplies and access by international humanitarian organizations to conflict-affected areas of Rakhine, Kachin, and Shan States. The government regularly denied access to the United Nations and international NGOs, arguing the military could not assure the NGO workers’ security or claimed humanitarian assistance would benefit ethnic armed group forces. In some cases the military allowed gradual access only as government forces regained control over contested areas. Although locally based organizations generally had more access to the 46,000 IDPs in areas outside government control, primarily in northern Kachin State, the military also increasingly restricted access for local organizations as military presence and control in these areas increased. At year’s end the government had not granted UN or international organizations humanitarian access to areas in Kachin State outside of military control. More than 98,000 persons remained displaced by conflict in Kachin and Shan States. In some cases villagers driven from their homes fled into the forest, frequently in heavily mined areas, without adequate food, security, or basic medical care (see section 2.d.).

On June 5, the military dropped leaflets over Tanai Township in Kachin State announcing “clearance operations” to begin on June 15. The leaflet warned the military would assume residents who did not leave by June 15 were cooperating with the KIA and would be treated as combatants. More than 1,000 villagers fled the area to shelter in churches and monasteries near neighboring villages. Local NGOs reported restrictions on humanitarian access to these IDPs.

On August 11, the military launched a raid and fired artillery into Kasung Village, Kachin State. Two churches were reportedly damaged and more than 1,000 residents fled to nearby Namti Village. Artillery caused heavy damage to a Roman Catholic church and moderately damaged a Baptist church and several houses, and there were reports military personnel looted the Roman Catholic church. On August 17, local NGOs reported the military blocked a delivery of humanitarian assistance. On August 23, the military and the KIA withdrew and all villagers were able to return to their homes.

Three journalists--Aye Naing and Pyae Phone Aung of DVB and Lawi Weng of Irrawaddy--were arrested on June 26 after covering a public ceremony organized by the TNLA and charged under the colonial-era Unlawful Associations Act of Section 17(1). Bail was repeatedly denied. On September 1, the military withdrew cases against six local journalists it detained under Sections 17(1) and 66(d), including Aye Naing, Pyae Phone Aung, and Lawi Weng.
There were some reports of the use of civilians to shield combatants.

Section 2. Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Expression, Including for the Press

The constitution provides that “every citizen shall be at liberty in the exercise of expressing and publishing freely their convictions and opinions,” but it contains the broad and ambiguous caveat that exercise of these rights must “not be contrary to the laws enacted for national security, prevalence of law and order, community peace and tranquility, or public order and morality.” Threats against and arrests of journalists increased.

Freedom of Expression: Authorities arrested, detained, convicted, and imprisoned citizens for defaming religion and expressing political opinions critical of the government, the military, and ultranationalist Buddhist groups, generally under the charges of defamation, protesting without a permit, or violating national security laws. Freedom of expression was more restricted during the year compared with 2016. This included a higher number of detentions of journalists using various laws, including laws carrying more severe punishments than those used previously.

The criminal defamation clause under the Telecommunications Law, known as Section 66(d), was frequently used to restrict freedom of expression and press. There was a dramatic increase in Section 66(d) cases compared with prior years. According to the Research Team of Telecommunication Law, an activist group whose aim is to abolish Section 66(d), 93 cases were enforced under the law, including seven cases brought by members of the NLD and another seven cases brought by members of the military from March 2016 to mid-November. Fifteen cases had already reached a verdict. At least 11 cases against 19 journalists under this law were pending as of October.

In August parliament amended Section 66(d), reducing the maximum sentence to three years, restricting third parties from filing charges without written consent from the offended party, and allowing judges to authorize bail in most cases (see section 1.d.). Civil society organizations and journalists noted the amendment as a positive step but expressed concern the law could still be used to restrict freedom of expression and the press. Several journalists, as well as critics of the government and the military, continued to face charges under this law. Other problematic laws that remained on the books, including the Unlawful Associations Act, Habitual Offenders Act, Electronic Transactions Law, Television and Video Act, Official Secrets Act, Law on Safeguarding the State from the Danger of Subversive Elements, and Section 505(b) of the penal code, were used to censor or prosecute public dissent. The Law Protecting the Privacy and Security of Citizens, enacted in March, was also used to prosecute a critic of the NLD-appointed chief minister of Mon State.

In March, Swe Win, editor of Myanmar Now news agency, was arrested following charges filed against him by Kyaw Myo Shwe, a supporter of the Association for the Protection of Race and Religion (Ma Ba Tha), an ultranationalist Buddhist organization, under Section 66(d) of the Telecommunications Law. Kyaw Myo Shwe alleged Swe Win shared a Facebook post suggesting the monk Wirathu, a prominent Ma Ba Tha figurehead, violated the monastic code of conduct by making statements commending the January 28 assassination of well-known Muslim constitutional lawyer Ko Ni (see section 1.a.). Swe Win was released on bail the next day by Mandalay Region’s Maha Aung Myay Township Court but was rearrested on July 30 at Yangon International Airport. Police stated he was arrested for trying to leave the country while a case was pending against him. He was later released. As of September the court had postponed the trial of Swe Win, declaring permission had not yet been granted for plaintiff Kyaw Myo Shwe--detained in Obo Prison for organizing a protest against the government in Mandalay--to attend court proceedings.

On April 12, NLD official Myo Yan Naung Thein, who was charged with Section 66(d) of the Telecommunication Law and arrested in October 2016 for posting comments critical of the military’s response in northern Rakhine State, was sentenced to six months in prison and released by a presidential pardon a few weeks prior to completing the sentence.

Some persons remained wary of speaking openly about politically sensitive topics due to monitoring and harassment by security services and ultranationalist Buddhist groups. Police continued to monitor politicians, journalists, writers, and diplomats. Journalists continued to complain about the widespread practice of government informants attending press conferences and other events, which they said intimidated reporters and the events’ hosts. Informants demanded lists of hosts and attendees.

Press and Media Freedom: Independent media were active and able to operate, despite some restrictions. The government continued to permit the publication of privately owned daily newspapers. As of September authorities approved 28 dailies; however, press freedom declined compared with 2016, and the security forces detained journalists under laws carrying more severe sentences than those it used in previous years.

Local media could cover human rights and political issues, including democratic reform, although stories critical of political figures and the security forces sometimes resulted in criminal charges. The government generally permitted the media to cover protests and civil conflict, topics not reported widely in state-run media. Nonetheless, during the year the government detained three journalists related to their coverage of civil conflict, and two related to their coverage of the situation in Rakhine State. In June an Irrawaddy journalist, two DVB journalists, and their support staff were detained under the Unlawful Associations Act, which had not been used against journalists in recent years, for their coverage of a drug-burning ceremony by the TNLA. In December, two Reuters reporters were detained and charged under the Official Secrets Act related to their investigation of security forces’ activities in northern Rakhine State.

Self-censorship continued, particularly on issues related to Buddhist extremism, the military, the situation in Rakhine State, and the peace process. The government ordered the media to use certain terms and themes to describe the situation in northern Rakhine State and threatened penalties against journalists who did not follow the government’s guidance, which exacerbated already high levels of self-censorship on this topic. Authorities prevented journalists from accessing northern Rakhine State, with the exception of several government-organized trips that participants reported to be tightly controlled and designed to advance the government’s narrative. The government continued to use visas to control foreign journalists, who reported visa validities ranged from 28 days to six months. The government barred the entry to the country by a journalist from Pakistan because of alleged security concerns regarding the situation in Rakhine State.

The military continued to practice zero tolerance of perceived critical media commentary. Editor Kyaw Min Swe of The Voice and satire columnist Kyaw Zwa Naing (pen name “British Ko Ko Maung”) were charged with defamation under Section 66(d) of the Telecommunications Law and detained in June for writing and publishing a satirical story of a military film. As in similar cases, the court did not provide bail for Kyaw Min Swe, although the satirist was released based on the Telecommunications Ministry’s comment he did not break the law. Kyaw Min Swe’s case was one of the five cases withdrawn by the military in early September.

Radio and television were the primary mass communication media. Circulation of independent news periodicals remained stable outside of urban areas. Several print publications maintained online news websites that were popular among those with access to the internet. The military, government, and government-linked businesspersons controlled the content of the eight privately or quasi-governmentally owned FM radio stations.

The government loosened its monopoly and control on domestic television broadcasting. It offered six public channels--five controlled by the Ministry of Information and one by the military; the ministry channels regularly showed the military’s content. The government allowed the general population to register satellite television receivers for a fee, but the cost was prohibitive for most persons outside of urban areas. The ministry announced it would allow five media outlets to apply for television channel licenses as private broadcasters. In April the ministry selected five media companies, including formerly exiled media groups DVB and Mizzima Media, to broadcast their content in a landmark public-private broadcasting partnership. The five companies planned to use state-owned broadcaster Myanmar Radio and Television’s transmission infrastructure, but would develop their own content. Many media outlets, however, reported the cost of applying for and maintaining a television channel was prohibitive.

Violence and Harassment: Nationalist groups continued to target journalists who spoke out regarding intercommunal and Rakhine State issues. Businesspersons engaged in illegal enterprises, sometimes together with local authorities, also harassed and threatened journalists reporting on their activities. Officials continued to monitor journalists in various parts of the country.

In December 2016 Eleven Media reporter Soe Moe Tun’s body was found on the side of a road in Monywa, Sagaing Region. He was investigating illegal logging and wood smuggling there at the time of his death. Police reported Soe Moe Tun was attacked and beaten in the back of the head with a stick. His friends and relatives expressed frustration at the police’s perceived lack of effort to investigate the case, and at year’s end, no one had been charged. Police claimed their investigation continued.

Censorship or Content Restrictions: Although generally not enforced, laws prohibit citizens from electronically passing information about the country to media located outside the country, exposing journalists who reported for or cooperated with international media to potential harassment, intimidation, and arrest. There were no reports of overt prepublication censorship of press publications, and the government allowed open discussion of some sensitive political and economic topics, but incidents of legal action against publications that criticized the military or the government continued to raise concern among local journalists and led to some self-censorship.

Instances of media self-censorship and suppression continued in connection with violence in northern Rakhine State. Reporters and media executives were reportedly fired for printing stories critical of the military’s actions in Rakhine State. In one instance after the August 25 attacks on security forces in Rakhine State, state television station MNTV temporarily cut broadcasts of BBC coverage of Rakhine State.

The organizer of the annual Human Rights, Human Dignity International Film Festival told reporters the government required him to submit all films to the government censorship board prior to screening them at the festival. This process resulted in the censorship of one film.

Libel/Slander Laws: Elements of the military sued journalists on multiple occasions for what they perceived as defamation or inaccurate reporting. The military sometimes dropped the cases after a lengthy court process.

Individuals, including political figures, also used the Telecommunications Law to sue reporters for perceived defamation. On May 26, Ma Sandi Myint Aung, a Union Solidarity and Development Party (USDP) supporter from Bago, was sentenced to six months in prison under the Telecommunications Law for sharing Facebook posts deemed insulting to State Counsellor Aung San Suu Kyi; the charges were pressed by another Bago local. The 2016 defamation suit by the chief minister of Rangoon, Phyo Min Thein, against Eleven Media Group chief executive U Than Htut Aung and the editor in chief Wai Phyo was pending as of September. The chief minister had argued that an article insinuating he was corrupt because he wore an expensive wristwatch amounted to defamation.

Internet Freedom

The government generally did not restrict or disrupt access to the internet or censor online content, although some NGOs reported the government blocked access to their web content on intercommunal dialogue. The government reportedly monitored internet communications under questionable legal authority and used defamation charges to intimidate and detain some individuals using social media to criticize the military. There were also instances of authorities intimidating online media outlets and internet users. Social media continued to be a popular forum to exchange ideas and opinions without direct government censorship. According to the International Telecommunication Union, approximately 25 percent of the population had access to the internet in 2016, but estimated mobile phone penetration was 90 percent, and other experts noted the majority of mobile handsets in the country could connect to the internet. The most recent Freedom on the Net report issued by international NGO Freedom House rated internet freedom in the country not free, and the rating worsened slightly from previous years.

Section 66(d) of the Telecommunications Act limited freedom of expression online. For example, on February 28, a social media user named Zaw Zaw was sentenced to six months’ imprisonment under Section 66(d) for posting text and photographs on Facebook that were considered defamatory toward leaders of the civilian government.

Academic Freedom and Cultural Events

There were similar government restrictions on academic freedom and cultural events as in 2016. The Ministry of Education in some cases demonstrated willingness to collaborate with international institutions to host educational and cultural events, as well as to expand educational opportunities for undergraduate students.

Although the government restricted political activity and freedom of association on university campuses, it generally allowed the informal establishment of student unions. Nonetheless, there are no laws that allow student unions to register officially with the government, and among university rectors and faculty there was considerable fear and suspicion of student unions. The office of the Students’ Union of Myanmar opened at Yangon University in July, and the Yangon University of Foreign Languages also opened a student union office. As in previous years, the All Burma Student’s Union was unable to register but participated in some activities through informal networks.

There were reported incidents of the government restricting cultural events. In January the military sued a group of nine high school and college students from Pathein under Article 500 of the criminal code for allegedly defaming the armed forces by performing an antiwar play. In June the Motion Picture Classification Board banned the showing of a film entitled Sittwe, which was due to open at an international human rights festival in Rangoon. The board cited concerns the film, which is a documentary about Buddhist and Muslim youth affected by conflict and forced segregation in northwestern Rakhine State, could have “festered” religious tensions.
b. Freedoms of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The constitution provides for the freedoms of peaceful assembly and association, but the government restricted these rights.

Freedom of Peaceful Assembly

The constitution provides the right to peaceful assembly, and peaceful protests were generally permitted around the country, although in November, the Rangoon region security and border affairs minister instructed police in 11 Rangoon townships to temporarily deny all applications for processions or assemblies, and sometimes the law was used to restrict peaceful protests if prior notification had not been granted or if conducted on private property. Farmers and social activists continued to hold protests over land rights and older cases of land confiscation throughout the country, and human rights groups continued to report cases in which the government arrested groups of farmers and those supporting them for demanding the return of confiscated land. Many reported cases involved land seized by the military under the former military regime and given to private companies or persons with ties to the military. The government also arrested some peaceful ultranationalist protesters. In September, four Burmese nationalists were sentenced to seven months in prison for staging an anti-Rohingya protest outside an embassy in April 2016. The four persons were sentenced for “inciting public unrest” and for violating the Peaceful Assembly and Peaceful Processions Act. The court justified the verdict on the basis that Kamayut Township had authorized the rally to take place in another location far from the embassy.

Common charges used to convict peaceful protesters included criminal trespass, violation of the Peaceful Assembly and Processions Act, and violation of Section 505(b) of the penal code, which criminalizes actions the government deemed likely to cause “an offence against the State or against the public tranquility.”

Freedom of Association

Although the constitution and laws allow citizens to form associations and organizations, the government sometimes restricted this right.

On May 23, the State Sangha Maha Nayaka Committee ordered that no group or individual would be allowed to operate under the banner of Ma Ba Tha, some of whose members, including Wirathu, had been sanctioned earlier in the year for inflaming tensions towards the Muslim community using ultranationalist rhetoric. The formal name of the organization is the Association for the Protection of Race and Religion. Responding to the ban, Ma Ba Tha leaders rebranded the organization under the name Buddha Dhamma Parahita Foundation.

The law on registering organizations stipulates voluntary registration for local NGOs and removes punishments for noncompliance for both local and international NGOs. Some NGOs that tried to register under this law found the process extremely onerous.

Activists reported civil society groups, community-based organizations, and informal networks operated openly and continued to discuss openly human rights and other political problems. They also reported, however, state surveillance of such operations and discussions was common.

c. Freedom of Religion

See the Department of State’s International Religious Freedom Report at www.state.gov/religiousfreedomreport/.

d. Freedom of Movement

The law does not explicitly and comprehensively protect freedom of internal movement, foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation. Laws provide rights for citizens to settle and reside anywhere in the country “according to law.” Laws related to noncitizens empower the president to make rules for requiring registration of foreigners’ movements and authorize officials to require registration for every temporary change of address exceeding 24 hours.

Abuse of Migrants, Refugees, and Stateless Persons: The government committed widespread and systematic abuses against the Rohingya population (see Stateless Persons).

In-country Movement: Regional and local orders, directives, and instructions restricted freedom of movement.

The government restricted the ability of IDPs and stateless persons to move. While a person’s possession of identification documents primarily related to their freedom of movement, authorities also considered race, ethnicity, religion, and place of origin as factors in enforcing these regulations. Residents of ethnic-minority states reported the government restricted the travel of, involuntarily confined, and forcibly relocated IDPs and stateless persons.

Restrictions on in-country movement of Muslims in Rakhine State were extensive. Authorities required the Rohingya, a largely stateless population, to carry special documents and travel permits for internal movement in five areas in Rakhine State where the Rohingya ethnic minority primarily resides: Buthidaung, Maungdaw, Rathedaung, Kyauktaw, and Sittwe. Township officers in Buthidaung and Maungdaw Townships continued to require Rohingya to submit a “form for informing absence from habitual residence” for permission to stay overnight in another village and to register on the guest list with the village administrator. Obtaining these forms and permits often involved extortion and bribes.

Restrictions governing the travel of foreigners, Rohingya, and others between townships in northern Rakhine State varied, depending on township, and generally required submission of a document known as “Form 4.” A traveler could obtain this form only from the township Immigration and National Registration Department (INRD) and only if that person provided an original copy of a family list, temporary registration card, and two guarantors. Travel authorized under Form 4 is valid for 14 days. The cost to obtain the form varied from township to township, with payments required to village administrators or to the township INRD office in amounts ranging from 50,000 to 100,000 kyats ($38 to $76). Change of residency from one village or township to another in northern Rakhine State required permission from the INRD or the township, district, and state officials. While Rohingya could change residency, the government would not register them on a new household registration list in that new location. This practice effectively prevented persons from changing residency.

International and local humanitarian staff required travel authorizations from the union and state level in order to operate in Rakhine State. Local staff had to submit travel applications two weeks in advance, and they were often denied. Humanitarian access to northern Rakhine State was suspended entirely in August; however, by the end of the year, the Red Cross Movement, World Food Program, and several other organizations had regained some degree of access. Media and human rights professionals were routinely denied access to Rakhine State.

Travel restrictions effectively prevented Rohingya from northern Rakhine State from traveling outside the state. There were reports the government prevented Rohingya living outside Rakhine State from traveling into the northern part of the state.
There were reports of regular, unannounced nighttime household checks in northern Rakhine State and in other areas.

In October the Kayin State government reportedly issued a letter calling on Muslim travelers to request and receive authorization from village officials. This letter was reportedly rescinded by the chief minister a few days later. Similarly, in Thandwe in southern Rakhine State in October, local officials reportedly required registration of Muslim travelers arriving at the airport, although no official restriction was in place.

Foreign Travel: The government maintained restrictions preventing foreign travel of political activists, former political prisoners, and some local staff of foreign embassies. While some administrative restrictions remained, local organizations reported encountering far fewer delays and restrictions. Stateless persons, particularly Rohingya, were unable to obtain documentation necessary for foreign travel.

Exile: There was a sizeable diaspora, with some citizens choosing to remain outside the country after years of self-imposed exile. During the year the government encouraged exiles to help rebuild their country, and some returned home; however, the government appeared to maintain an opaque “black list” of individuals, including some from the exile community, who were prohibited from entering the country.

Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs)

An estimated 220,000 persons remained internally displaced by violence in Kachin, Rakhine, and northern Shan States at the end of the year. As of September the UN Office of Coordination for Humanitarian Affairs estimated more than 98,000 persons remained displaced because of continued armed conflict in Kachin and Shan States. Camps housing more than half of the IDPs were located in areas beyond government control where government forces restricted humanitarian access. Some IDPs also found refuge with hosting families, and others hid in forested areas straddling the border with China. Approximately 120,000 Rohingya had been confined to IDP camps in Rakhine State since 2012 intercommunal violence. A small number of Kaman and Rakhine had also lived in IDP camps since 2012. This figure did not include an additional unknown number, estimated between 30,000 and 100,000, who were internally displaced following atrocities. beginning in August in northern Rakhine State. Accurate figures were difficult to determine due to poor access to affected areas.

Fighting between government forces and ethnic armed groups continued in Kachin, Shan, Kayin, and Rakhine States. Ethnic armed groups also clashed among themselves in northern Shan State. Access to displaced persons in or near conflict zones continued to be a challenge, with the government restricting access by humanitarian actors to provide aid to affected communities.

Nearly 90,000 Rohingya IDPs lived in Sittwe’s rural camps, displaced since 2012, where they relied on assistance from aid agencies. Humanitarian agencies provided access to clean water, food, shelter, and sanitation in most IDP camps. The government limited health and education services and livelihood opportunities through severe and systematic restrictions on movement. Conditions in Aung Mingalar, the sole remaining Muslim quarter in Sittwe, remained poor, with Rohingya allowed to leave the fenced and guarded compound only to shop for necessities at nearby markets or to visit outside health clinics if they paid a fee to security services.

During the year humanitarian agencies received travel authorizations to provide assistance sporadically, and international humanitarian staff were not allowed to travel outside of urban areas in Kachin, northern Shan, and northern Rakhine States for much of the year. Humanitarian access to Rakhine State was irregular and restricted. Humanitarian workers continued to be under pressure from local communities to reduce assistance to Muslim IDPs and villages, despite limited access to meet humanitarian needs.

Following the August attacks in northern Rakhine State, security forces launched security operations consisting of atrocities against civilians, and the government temporarily restricted all humanitarian access to central Rakhine State and the three townships of northern Rakhine State--Maungdaw, Buthidaung, and Rathedaung. The government allowed sporadic access to some parts of central Rakhine State to some organizations in September. In northern Rakhine State the government authorized only Red Cross Movement organizations to provide emergency assistance in that area, and humanitarian access remained severely limited at year’s end. Beginning in August local staff of humanitarian organizations, many of whom lived among affected populations, had to apply for travel permits in order to provide services.
The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) noted some small-scale, spontaneous IDP returns in the southeast of the country.

Protection of Refugees

Access to Asylum: The country’s laws do not provide for the granting of asylum or refugee status, and the government has not established a system for providing protection to refugees. UNHCR did not register any asylum seekers during the year.

Stateless Persons

The Myanmar Population and Housing Census reported in 2016 there were an estimated 1.09 million persons in Rakhine State who were not enumerated in the census. According to UNHCR, this number reflected an accurate estimate of the Rohingya population in Rakhine State, the vast majority of whom were stateless. Following the forced displacement of approximately 700,000 Rohingya to Bangladesh, an estimated 300,000 to 400,000 Rohingya remained in Rakhine State. There were likely significant numbers of stateless persons and persons with undetermined nationality throughout the country, including persons of Chinese, Indian, and Nepali descent.

Provisions of the Citizenship Law contributed to statelessness. Following the entry into force of the 1982 law and procedures, the government released a list of 135 recognized “national ethnic groups” whose members are automatically “citizens.” This list excluded the Rohingya, and subsequent actions by the government rendered the vast majority of the Rohingya ethnic minority stateless. The law defines “national ethnic group” only as a racial and ethnic group that can prove origins in the country dating back to 1823, the year prior to British colonization. Several ethnic minority groups, including the Chin and Kachin, criticized the classification system as inaccurate. While the majority of the country’s inhabitants automatically acquired citizenship under these provisions, some minority groups, including the Rohingya; persons of Indian, Chinese, and Nepali descent; and “Pashu” (Straits Chinese), some of whose members had previously enjoyed citizenship in the country, are not included on the government’s list. The Rohingya and others are technically eligible for full citizenship via standard mechanisms unrelated to ethnicity, but they were made to go through a special scrutiny process that generally resulted in naturalized citizenship and did not result in provision of rights generally associated with citizenship. The law does not provide protection for children born in the country who do not have a “relevant link” to another state. UNHCR, the Advisory Commission on Rakhine State, and a number of human rights and humanitarian organizations continued to advocate amendment of the Citizenship Law to bring it in line with the country’s international human rights obligations and commitments (see section 6, Children).

The name Rohingya is used in reference to a group that self-identifies as belonging to an ethnic group defined by religious, linguistic, and other ethnic features. Rohingya hold that they have resided in what is now Rakhine State for generations. In May 2016 the government established a policy of using “Muslims in Rakhine State” to refer to the population, although military officials and many government officials, particularly in Rakhine State, continued to use the pejorative term “Bengali,” and the term was still used on identification documents. The government offers a citizenship verification process to Rohingya to determine who qualifies for citizenship on the basis of mechanisms in the 1982 law that provide pathways to citizenship other than being a member of a national ethnic race. This process met with limited participation from the Rohingya community. The government no longer requires all participants to identify as “Bengali” as a condition of participating in the process, nor does it require applicants to list their race or religion on forms in the earliest phases of the process, although implementing officials reportedly continued to require participants to identify as “Bengali.” Those who are verified as a citizen (of whatever type) would have “Bengali” listed as their race on their citizenship scrutiny card. This process and the separate national verification process was not seen as credible by the Rohingya community, in part because many continued to be told they were required to apply as “Bengali,” because the few Rohingya who received national verification cards or citizenship through these processes did not receive significant rights and benefits, and because the government implemented the process in a coercive manner, for example, by requiring a national verification card to go fishing or access a bank account. The government continued to call on Rohingya to participate, but many of them expressed the need for more assurances about the results of the process. Many said they were already citizens and expressed fear the government would either not affirm their citizenship or would provide a form of lesser citizenship--naturalized rather than full--thereby formalizing their lack of rights.

According to the Citizenship Law, two lesser forms of citizenship exist: associate and naturalized. According to other legal statutes, these citizens are unable to run for political office; serve in the military, police, or public administration; inherit land or money; or pursue certain professional degrees, such as medicine and law.
According to the Citizenship Law, only the third generation of associate or naturalized citizens are able to acquire full citizenship.

Rohingya experienced severe legal, economic, and social discrimination. The government required them to receive prior approval for travel outside their village of residence; limited their access to higher education, health care, and other basic services; and prohibited them from working as civil servants, including as doctors, nurses, or teachers. Authorities singled out Rohingya in northern Rakhine State to perform forced labor and arbitrarily arrested them. Authorities required Rohingya to obtain official permission for marriages and limited the registration of children to two per family, but local enforcement of the two-child policy was inconsistent. For the most part, authorities registered additional children beyond the two-child limit for Rohingya families, yet there were cases of authorities not doing so.

Restrictions impeded the ability of Rohingya to construct houses or religious buildings.

Local security officials in Rakhine State committed violent crimes and arbitrarily arrested an unknown number of Rohingya, according to reports. Many of these reports cited events from August to December.

Section 3. Freedom to Participate in the Political Process

The constitution provides the ability for citizens to choose their government through elections held by secret ballot, although certain provisions prevent it from being a fully representational system and assuring the free expression of the will of the people. Constitutional provisions grant one-quarter of all national and regional parliamentary seats to active-duty military appointees and provide the military authority to appoint the ministers of defense, home affairs—which has responsibility for subnational governance as well as the police, prisons, and other matters--and border affairs, and indefinitely assume power over all branches of the government should the president declare a national state of emergency. A separate constitutional provision prohibits persons with immediate relatives with foreign citizenship from becoming president. Amending the constitution requires more than 75 percent approval by members of parliament, giving the military veto power over constitutional amendments.

Elections and Political Participation
Recent Elections: International organizations reported the country conducted its April by-elections in accordance with generally accepted democratic principles. Observers considered the 2015 national election to be generally reflective of the will of the people, notwithstanding some structural shortcomings. Observers raised concerns a large number of unelected seats in parliament were reserved for military officers; some candidates were disqualified on a discriminatory basis; almost all members of the Rohingya community, many of whom voted in elections prior to 2015, were disenfranchised; and the government canceled voting in some conflict-affected ethnic minority areas. The NLD, chaired by Aung San Suu Kyi, won more than 77 percent of the contested 1,150 seats at the state, regional, and union levels in the 2015 election.

Political Parties and Political Participation: Opposition parties and civil society organizations continued to exercise their rights to assemble and protest.

Participation of Women and Minorities: No laws limit the participation of women and members of minorities in the political process, and they did participate. Nevertheless, women and minorities continued to be underrepresented in government. Aung San Suu Kyi was the only woman in a cabinet of 22 ministers serving at the national level. The representation of women at both the national and the state and regional levels was more than 10 percent among elected representatives. Women led two subnational governments, including the chief ministers of Kayin State and Tanintharyi Region.

As of October, five chief ministers of the seven ethnic states belonged to the ethnic groups of their states, including the chief minister of Rakhine State, and one of two union-level vice presidents belonged to the Chin ethnic minority group. The representation of ethnic minority parliamentarians from ethnic minority political parties at both the national, state, and regional level was approximately 9 percent. These figures from all levels did not account for ethnic minority members of the NLD or USDP, the former of which included numerous ethnic members, although no clear statistics existed.

Rohingya continued to be excluded from the political process, because their political rights (whether to vote or run for office) remained severely curtailed since the vast majority are stateless. Although Rohingya comprised approximately one-third of the population in Rakhine State, there were no Rohingya representatives in the state parliament, and most Rohingya-majority areas were represented by an ethnic Rakhine nationalist party.
Section 4. Corruption and Lack of Transparency in Government

The law provides criminal penalties for corruption by officials, and the government continued efforts to curb corruption. Although anecdotal reports suggested corruption among elected officials declined significantly since April 2016, the government’s anticorruption efforts remained limited in some parts of the government, including the General Administration Department, which falls under the authority of the minister of home affairs, who is appointed by the military per the constitution.

Corruption: Corruption remained a problem, particularly in the judiciary. Police reportedly often required victims to pay substantial bribes for criminal investigations and routinely extorted money from the civilian population. The government launched a new code of ethics for judges and prosecutors implementing reforms to better address corruption in the legal system. The government took some steps to investigate and address corruption of government officials.

In July, four senior officials from the Ministry of Home Affairs were prosecuted for a scandal involving returning confiscated land to its rightful owner. The Ministry of Home Affairs transferred the case to the Anti-Corruption Commission, and the defendants awaited trial at year’s end.

Financial Disclosure: Public officials were not subject to public financial disclosure laws. The law requires the president and vice presidents to furnish a list of family assets to the speaker of the joint houses of parliament, and the law requires persons appointed by the president to furnish a list of personal assets to the president. The government did not make the reports available to the public.

Civil servants cannot accept gifts worth more than 25,000 kyats ($19). The rules also require civil servants to report all offers of gifts to their supervisors, whether or not they are accepted.

Section 5. Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Abuses of Human Rights

The government did not fully allow domestic human rights organizations to function independently. Human rights NGOs were able to open offices and operate, but there were very few reports of harassment by authorities, although surveillance was common, and there were reports authorities sometimes pressured landlords to not do business with activists or former political prisoners.

Human rights activists and advocates, including representatives from international NGOs, continued to obtain short-term visas that required them to leave the country periodically for renewal. The government continued to monitor the movements of foreigners and interrogated citizens concerning contacts with foreigners.

The United Nations or Other International Bodies: As of year’s end, the government had not agreed to the opening of an Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). While formally allowing OHCHR staff to maintain a nominal presence in country, the government delayed visa issuance for some OHCHR staff members and continued to require travel authorization for travel to Rakhine State and conflict areas.

On March 24, the UN Human Rights Council established an independent international fact-finding mission to “establish the facts and circumstances of the alleged recent human rights violations by military and security forces, and abuses, in Myanmar, in particular in Rakhine State, including but not limited to arbitrary detention, torture and inhuman treatment, rape and other forms of sexual violence, extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary killings, enforced disappearances, forced displacement and unlawful destruction of property, with a view to ensuring full accountability for perpetrators and justice for victims.” The government dissociated itself from the relevant resolution and did not grant the Fact Finding Mission permission to enter the country. The Human Rights Council extended the Fact Finding Mission’s mandate for an additional year at the Human Rights Council meeting in September.

Unlike in past years, the government announced in December it would not allow the UN special rapporteur for the situation of human rights in Myanmar to enter the country. Earlier in the year, the government allowed the special rapporteur to enter but limited her access to parts of Kachin State and prevented her from meeting with some prisoners.

Following a 2012 government pledge to allow the ICRC prison access, the ICRC had full access to independent civilian prisons and labor camps. The government also allowed the ICRC to operate in ethnic-minority states, including in Shan, Rakhine, and Kachin States.
Government Human Rights Bodies: The Myanmar National Human Rights Commission investigated some incidents of gross human rights abuses. In some instances it called on the government to hold accountable members of the police force or military implicated in the crimes, and in others, it denied abuses occurred. Its ability to operate as a credible, independent mechanism remained limited. At the end of September, a commissioner from the Human Rights Commission visited northern Rakhine State and declared that security forces had not used disproportionate force or committed any human rights abuses. The commission supported the development of human rights education curricula, distributed human rights materials, and conducted human rights training.

The Advisory Commission on Rakhine State, established by Aung San Suu Kyi in 2016 and led by former UN secretary-general Kofi Annan, released its final report on August 24, immediately preceding the ARSA attacks in northern Rakhine State. The government established a commission to implement the recommendations held in the final report headed by the MSWRR union minister. In her September 19 public address, Aung San Suu Kyi committed to implementing the recommendations as expediently as possible.

Multiple government-led investigations into reports of widespread abuses by security forces against Rohingya in northern Rakhine State in October and November 2016 did not result in prosecutions or accountability. The Investigation Commission on Maungdaw, headed by military-appointed Vice President Myint Swe, released its interim report on January 3, stating there was “insufficient evidence to take legal action” regarding allegations of rape, and the unrest was due to foreign-funded “extremists.” The military and police led separate investigations into security force abuses in northern Rakhine State, which fed into the Investigation Commission on Maungdaw’s final report released in August. In its final report, the government-led commission stated there was no credible basis for allegations of human rights abuses in northern Rakhine State. International experts pointed to serious flaws in the commission’s methodology, including interrupting alleged victims of abuses to assert that their testimony was false and then broadcasting the exchange on national television.

Section 6. Discrimination, Societal Abuses, and Trafficking in Persons

Women

Rape and Domestic Violence: Rape is illegal but remained a significant problem, and the government did not enforce the law effectively. Spousal rape is not a crime unless the wife is younger than 13 years. Police generally investigated reported cases of rape, but there were reports police investigations were not sensitive to victims. Civil society groups continued to report police in some cases verbally abused women who reported rape, and women could be sued for impugning the dignity of the perpetrator.

Domestic violence against women, including spousal abuse, remained a serious problem. Abuse within families was prevalent and considered socially acceptable. Spousal abuse or domestic violence was difficult to measure because the government did not maintain statistics and victims typically did not report it. Laws prohibit committing bodily harm against another person, but there are no laws specifically against domestic violence or spousal abuse unless the wife is younger than 14. Punishment for violating the law includes sentences ranging from one year to life in prison, in addition to possible fines. Overlapping and at times contradictory legal provisions complicated implementation of these limited protections.

The United Nations, media, and NGOs reported continued allegations of rape by military and security officials in Kachin, Shan, and Rakhine States. The military rejected all allegations rape was an institutionalized practice in the military but admitted in 2014 its soldiers had committed 40 known rapes of civilian women since 2011.

Sexual Harassment: The penal code prohibits sexual harassment and imposes fines or a maximum of one-year’s imprisonment for verbal harassment and a maximum of two years’ imprisonment for physical contact. There was no information on the prevalence of the problem because these crimes were largely unreported. Local civil society organizations reported police investigators were not sensitive to victims and rarely followed through with investigations or prosecutions.

Coercion in Population Control: Coerced abortion or involuntary sterilization did not occur. In 2015, however, the government enacted the Population Control and Health Care Law, which contains provisions that, if enforced, could undermine protections for reproductive and women’s rights, including imposing birth-spacing requirements. Under the law the president or the national government may designate “special regions” for health care following consideration of factors such as population, natural resources, birth rates, and food availability. Once a special region is declared, the government allows the creation of special health-care organizations to perform various tasks, including establishing regulations related to family planning methods. The government has not designated any such special regions since the law’s enactment.

A two-child local order issued by the government of Rakhine State pertaining to the Rohingya population in two northern townships remained in effect, but the government and NGOs reported it was not consistently enforced (see section 1.f.).

Discrimination: By law women enjoy the same legal status and rights as men, including property and inheritance rights and religious and personal status, but it was not clear if the government enforced the law. The law requires equal pay for equal work, but it was not clear if the formal sector respected this requirement. NGOs reported sectors such as the garment industry did not comply. Poverty affected women disproportionately. The law governing hiring of civil service personnel states nothing shall prevent the appointment of men to “positions that are suitable for men only,” with no further definition of what constitutes positions “suitable for men only.”

Customary law was widely used to address issues of marriage, property, and inheritance, and it differs from the provisions under statutory law.

Children

Birth Registration: The 1982 Citizenship Law automatically confers full citizenship status to 135 recognized national ethnic groups as well as to persons who met citizenship requirements under previous citizenship legislation. Moreover, the government confers full citizenship to second-generation children of both parents with any citizenship, as long as at least one parent has full citizenship. Third-generation children of associate or naturalized citizens can acquire full citizenship. Residents derive full citizenship through parents, both of whom must be one of the 135 officially recognized “national races.” Under the law the government does not officially recognize Rohingya as an ethnic group.

A prominent international NGO noted significant rural-urban disparities in birth registration. In major cities (for example, Rangoon and Mandalay), births were registered immediately. In larger cities parents must register births to qualify for basic public services and obtain national identification cards. In smaller towns and villages, however, birth registration often was informal or nonexistent. For the Rohingya community, birth registration was a significant problem (see section 2.d.). The Advisory Commission on Rakhine State noted in its interim report nearly half of all residents in Rakhine State lacked birth documentation and recommended the government introduce a comprehensive birth registration campaign.

A birth certificate provided important protections for children, particularly against child labor, early marriage, and recruitment into the armed forces and armed groups. Sometimes a lack of birth registration, but more often a lack of availability, complicated access to public services in remote communities.

Education: By law education is compulsory, free, and universal through the fourth grade. The government continued to allocate minimal resources to public education, and schools charged informal fees. Many child rights activists in Rangoon noted such fees were decreasing and were less often mandatory.

Education access for internally displaced and stateless children remained limited.

Child Abuse: Laws prohibit child abuse, but they were neither adequate nor enforced. NGOs reported corporal punishment was widely used against children as a means of discipline. The punishment for violations is a maximum of two years’ imprisonment or a maximum fine of 10,000 kyats ($7.50). There was anecdotal evidence of violence against children occurring within families, schools, in situations of child labor and exploitation, and in armed conflict. The MSWRR expanded its child protection pilot programs. In Rakhine State continued violence left many families and children displaced or with restrictions on their movement, which in turn exposed them to an environment of violence and exploitation. Armed conflict in Kachin and Shan States had a similar adverse effect on children in those areas.

Early and Forced Marriage: The law stipulates different minimum ages for marriage based on religion and gender: the minimum age for Buddhists is 18 years, and the minimum age for Christian boys is 16 and 15 for girls, but child marriage still occurred. According to the 2014 census, more than 13 percent of women married between ages 15 and 19. There were no reliable statistics on forced marriage. A review conducted by a UN organization in February found child marriage remained an important and underaddressed problem in rural areas.
Sexual Exploitation of Children: Children were subjected to sex trafficking in the country, and a small number of foreign child sex tourists exploited children. The law does not explicitly prohibit child sex tourism, but it prohibits pimping and prostitution, and the penal code prohibits sex with a minor younger than 14 years. The penalty for the purchase and sale of commercial sex acts from a child younger than 18 is 10 years’ imprisonment. The law prohibits pornography and specifies a penalty of two years’ minimum imprisonment and a fine of 10,000 kyats ($7.50). If a victim is younger than 14, the law considers the sexual act statutory rape. The maximum sentence for statutory rape is two years’ imprisonment when the victim is between 12 and 14, and 10 years’ to life imprisonment when the victim is younger than 12.

Displaced Children: The mortality rate of internally displaced children in conflict areas was significantly higher than in the rest of the country (see section 2.d.).

Anti-Semitism

There was one synagogue in Rangoon serving a small Jewish congregation. There were no reports of anti-Semitic acts.

Trafficking in Persons

See the Department of State’s Trafficking in Persons Report at www.state.gov/j/tip/rls/tiprpt/.

Persons with Disabilities

The law prohibits discrimination against persons with physical, sensory, hearing, intellectual, and mental disabilities. The law does not specifically prohibit discrimination against persons with disabilities in air travel and other forms of transportation, but directs the government to assure that persons with disabilities have easy access to public transportation. The government did not effectively enforce these provisions.
The Ministry of Health is responsible for medical rehabilitation of persons with disabilities, and the MSWRR is responsible for vocational training, education, and social protection strategies. The government recognized the Myanmar Federation of Persons with Disabilities to serve as an umbrella group for organizations that serve persons with disabilities. The National Committee for the Rights of Persons with Disability is the ministerial committee formed to monitor the implementation of the law; for the second consecutive year, it did not convene.

Civil society groups reported that often children with disabilities attended school through secondary education at a significantly lower rate than other persons, and many never attended school due to stigma and lack of any accommodation for their needs.

According to the Myanmar Physical Handicap Association, a significant number of military personnel, armed group members, and civilians had a disability because of conflict, including because of torture and landmine incidents. There were approximately 12,000 amputees in the country--two-thirds believed to be landmine survivors--supported by five physical rehabilitation centers throughout the country. Persons with disabilities reported stigma, discrimination, and abuse from civilian and government officials. Students with disabilities cited barriers to inclusive education as a significant disadvantage.

Military veterans with disabilities received official benefits on a priority basis, usually a civil service job at equivalent pay, but both military and ethnic-minority survivors in rural areas typically did not have access to livelihood opportunities or affordable medical treatment. Official assistance to nonmilitary persons with disabilities in principle included two-thirds of pay for a maximum of one year for a temporary disability and a tax-free stipend for permanent disability. While the law provides job protection for workers who become disabled, authorities did not implement it.

National/Racial/Ethnic Minorities

Ethnic minorities constituted 30 to 40 percent of the population. The seven ethnic minority states composed approximately 60 percent of the national territory, and significant numbers of minorities also resided within the country’s other regions. Wide-ranging governmental and societal discrimination against minorities persisted, including in areas such as education, housing, employment, and access to health services. International observers noted significant wage discrepancies based on religious and ethnic backgrounds were common.
Burmese generally remained the mandatory language of instruction in government schools. Civil society organizations expressed disappointment the government’s National Education Strategic Plan, which was released in April, did not cover issues related to mother tongue instruction and was not adequately informed by consultations with ethnic stakeholders. In schools controlled by ethnic groups, students sometimes had no access to the national curriculum. There were very few domestic publications in indigenous-minority languages.

Tension between the military and ethnic minority populations, while somewhat diminished in areas with cease-fire agreements, remained high, and the military stationed forces in some ethnic groups’ areas of influence and controlled certain cities, towns, and highways. Ethnic armed groups, including the Kachin Independence Organization and the KNU, pointed to the increased presence of army troops as a major source of tension and insecurity. Reported abuses included killings, beatings, torture, forced labor, forced relocations, and rapes of members of ethnic groups by government soldiers. Some groups also committed abuses (see section 1.g.).

The Rohingya in Rakhine State faced severe discrimination based on their ethnicity. Most Rohingya faced severe restrictions on their ability to travel, avail themselves of health-care services, engage in economic activity (see section 7.d.), obtain an education, and register births, deaths, and marriages (see section 2.d.). Most of those displaced in 2012 remained confined to semipermanent camps with severely limited access to education, health care, and livelihoods.

In early August the military deployed in parts of northern Rakhine State reportedly committed serious human rights violations and abuses, including enforced disappearances and arbitrary arrests. On August 25, ARSA claimed responsibility for coordinated attacks against 30 security outposts in northern Rakhine State. The security forces, as well as vigilante groups acting in concert with security forces, then reportedly committed widespread atrocities against Rohingya villagers, including extrajudicial killings, rape, torture, arbitrary arrest, and burning of hundreds of villages, religious structures, and other buildings. These atrocities and associated events forced more than 655,000 Rohingya to flee to Bangladesh as of December and constituted ethnic cleansing against the Rohingya.

Acts of Violence, Discrimination, and Other Abuses Based on Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity
Political reforms in recent years made it easier for the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and intersex (LGBTI) community to hold public events and openly participate in society, yet discrimination, stigma and a lack of acceptance among the general population persisted. Consensual same-sex sexual activity remains illegal under the penal code, which contains a provision against “unnatural offenses” with a penalty of a maximum of 10 years’ imprisonment and a fine or “transportation for life.” Laws against “unnatural offenses” apply equally to both men and women; these laws were rarely enforced. LGBTI persons reported police used the threat of prosecution to extort bribes. While the penal code is used more for coercion or bribery, LGBTI persons, particularly transgender women, were most frequently charged under so-called shadow and disguise laws. These laws use the justification that a person dressed or acting in a way that is perceived as not being in line with their biological gender is in “disguise.” According to a report by a local NGO, transgender women reported higher levels of police abuse and discrimination than other members of the LGBTI community.

There were reports of discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity in employment. LGBTI persons reported facing discrimination from medical-care providers.

HIV and AIDS Social Stigma

The constitution provides for the individual’s right to health care in accordance with national health policy, prohibits discrimination by the government on the grounds of “status,” and requires equal opportunity in employment and equality before the law. Persons with HIV/AIDS could theoretically submit a complaint to the government if a breach of their constitutional rights or denial of access to essential medicines occurred, such as antiretroviral therapy, but there were no reports of individuals submitting complaints on these grounds. There are no HIV-specific protective laws or laws that specifically address the human rights aspects of HIV.

There were continued reports of societal violence and discrimination, including employment discrimination, against persons with HIV/AIDS. Negative incidents such as exclusion from social gatherings and activities; verbal insults, harassment, and threats; and physical assaults continued to occur. Laws that criminalize behaviors linked to an increased risk of acquiring HIV/AIDS remain in place, directly fueling stigma and discrimination against persons engaged in these behaviors and impeding their access to HIV prevention, treatment, and care services.
Law enforcement practices contributed to high levels of stigma and discrimination against female sex workers and transgender women that in turn hindered their access to HIV prevention, treatment, and social protection services. Police harassment of sex workers deterred the workers from carrying condoms.

Other Societal Violence or Discrimination

There were reports of other cases of societal violence, and anti-Muslim sentiment and discrimination persisted. Members of Bamar Buddhist nationalist groups, including members of Ma Ba Tha, continued to denigrate Islam and called for a boycott of Muslim businesses.

Muslim communities complained about unequal treatment by police, pressures to practice Islam in private, difficulty in obtaining citizenship cards, close monitoring of their travel by local government, and restrictions to education opportunities. Religious groups noted the January assassination of Ko Ni had a chilling effect on Muslims fighting for improved treatment under the law (see section 1.a.).

In April, 12 nationalist monks and dozens of local residents in Rangoon forced two madrassahs to be chained shut. The group alleged the structures were illegal and demanded local officials close them. Muslim leaders noted the madrassahs had been used for prayers for many years and told local media they believed nationalists bullied them because of their religion.

In May nationalist monks claimed Rohingya were hiding illegally in Mingala Taungnyunt Township in Rangoon. Media reports indicated the monks informed local police about their suspicions, and when local police investigated and found no one to be living illegally in the neighborhood, the monks and Buddhist laypersons instigated violence against the Muslim community in the neighborhood. Media also reported two Muslim residents were injured before police intervened by firing warning shots into the air. Police arrested eight persons for their involvement in the violence.

On October 30, Buddhist leader Sitagu Sayadaw gave a sermon to soldiers, live-streamed on Facebook to more than 250,000 persons, at a military training school in Kayin State, where he quoted a parable in which a Buddhist king is told by his advisors that the killing of millions of Hindu Tamils only added up to one and a half real human beings. In his sermon the Sitagu Sayadaw also noted the need for Buddhist leaders and the military to work together for national unity. The remarks were generally interpreted as condoning the military’s abuses against members of religious minority groups and suggesting that in the course of battle, it is less of a sin for soldiers to kill non-Buddhists than to kill Buddhists.

Multiple sources noted that restrictions against Muslims and Christians impeded their ability to pursue higher education opportunities and assume high-level government positions and that Muslims were unable to invest and trade freely.

Section 7. Worker Rights

a. Freedom of Association and the Right to Collective Bargaining

The law provides for the right of workers to form and join independent unions, bargain collectively, and conduct legal strikes. The law permits labor organizations to demand the reinstatement of workers dismissed for union activity, but it does not explicitly prohibit antiunion discrimination in the form of demotions or mandatory transfers, nor does it offer protection for workers seeking to form a union. The law does not provide for adequate protections for workers from dismissal before a union is officially registered.

Laws prohibit personnel of the defense services, armed forces, and police force from forming unions. The law permits workers to join unions only within their category of trade or activity, and the definition of trade or activity lacks clarity. Basic labor organizations must have a minimum of 30 workers and register through township registrars with the Chief Registrar’s Office of the Ministry of Labor, Immigration, and Population (Ministry of Labor). Township labor organizations require a minimum of 10 percent of relevant basic labor organizations to register; regional or state labor organizations require a minimum of 10 percent of relevant township labor organizations. Each of these higher-level unions must include only organizations within the same trade or activity. Similarly, federations and confederations also require a minimum number of regional or state labor organizations (10 percent and 20 percent, respectively) from the next lower level in order to register formally. The law permits labor federations and confederations to affiliate with international union federations and confederations.

The law provides for voluntary registration for local NGOs, including NGOs working on labor issues. Organizations that choose to register are required to send organizational bylaws and formation documents to the government. Broader restrictions on freedom of assembly remained in place (see section 2.b.).
The law gives unions the right to represent workers, to negotiate and bargain collectively with employers, and to send representatives to a conciliation body or conciliation tribunal. The law permits unions to assist in individual disputes and individual employment agreements. The law does not contain detailed measures regarding management of the bargaining process, such as a duty to bargain in good faith, a period for bargaining, registration, or extension or enforcement of collective agreements. The National Tripartite Dialogue Forum, with representatives of government, business, and labor, met quarterly during the year, with frequent meetings of two technical working groups to negotiate specific issues in the development of revised legislation on collective bargaining and dispute settlement resolution.

The law stipulates that disputes in special economic zones be settled in accordance with original contracts and existing laws. Under the law on special economic zones, the government appointed a labor inspector for each such zone and established zonal tripartite committees responsible for setting wage levels and monitoring the ratio of local and foreign labor.

The law provides for the right to strike in most sectors, with a majority vote by workers, permission of the relevant labor federations, and detailed information and three days’ advance notice provided to the employer and the relevant conciliation body. The law does not permit strikes or lockouts in essential services. In “public utility services” (including the transport; cargo and freight; postal; sanitation; information, communication, and technology; energy; petroleum; and financial sectors), lockouts are permitted with a minimum of 14 days’ notice provided to the relevant labor organizations and conciliation body. Strikes in public utility services require generally the same measures as in other sectors, but with 14 days’ advance notice and negotiation between workers and management before the strike takes place to determine maintenance of minimum service levels. The law prohibits strikes addressing problems not directly relevant to labor issues.

The law provides for a framework for the settlement of individual and collective disputes at the enterprise, township, regional, and national levels through conciliation or arbitration, but it lacks sufficient mechanisms for enforcement. Penalties for noncompliance with the settlement agreements called for in the law are low: 100,000 kyats ($75) and/or a maximum of one year in prison.

Labor groups reported their biggest challenge remained labor organizations’ inability to register at the national level, a prerequisite for entering labor framework agreements with multinational companies, due to the registration requirements under the law. In addition, the International Labor Organization (ILO), labor activists, and media continued to report concerns employers subsequently fired or engaged in other forms of reprisal for workers who formed or joined labor unions, and trade unions reported cases in which criminal charges were filed against workers for exercising their right to strike. Labor organizations also reported local labor offices imposed unnecessary bureaucratic requirements for union registration that were inconsistent with the law.

Workers and workers’ organizations continued to report they generally found the Ministry of Labor to be helpful in urging employers to negotiate, but there were consistent reports of employers ignoring the negotiated agreements or engaging in other forms of antiunion discrimination.

Media outlets reported far fewer allegations of dismissal, imprisonment, and beatings of workers for organizing activity than in previous years.

b. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Laws prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labor and provide for the punishment of persons who impose forced labor on others, but the government did not effectively enforce the law.

The law provides for criminal penalties for forced labor violations; penalties differ depending on whether the military, the government, or a private citizen committed the violation. Prosecution of military perpetrators occurs under either the military or penal code. Civilian perpetrators may be subject to administrative action or criminal proceedings under the penal code. The maximum penalty under the penal code is 12 months in prison; under the military code it is seven years in prison. International observers deemed the penalties sufficient to deter forced labor.

The government continued to implement some aspects of the ILO action plan to eliminate forced labor but did not renew it despite its expiration in 2015. Both the military and the government responded to complaints logged by the complaints mechanism on an ad hoc basis during the lapse in the ILO mechanism, closing out 34 cases during the year, some of which were initiated in previous years. The ILO reported it continued to receive a significant number of complaints of forced labor, although the number was decreasing overall. Moreover, it noted the government’s and military’s use of forced or compulsory labor of adults and children and the failure to hold perpetrators accountable remained a problem (see section 7.c.). As of August the ILO received an average of 36 complaints monthly. The ILO attributed the continuing high rates of reporting to increasing awareness of the illegality of forced labor along with strong support networks provided by the ILO and civil society organizations and the continued low levels of public trust and confidence in the national justice system. The government extended the ILO framework in November 2016, but it expired in December 2017.

Reports of forced labor occurred across the country, including in conflict and cease-fire areas, and the prevalence was higher in states with significant armed conflict. Forced labor reports included forced portering and activities related to the military’s “self-reliance” policy. Under the self-reliance policy, military battalions are responsible for procuring their own food and labor supplies from local villagers—a major contributing factor to forced labor and other abuses.

The ILO received reports of forced labor in the private sector, including excessive overtime with or without compensation by workers at risk of losing their jobs and also by bonded labor. Domestic workers also remained at risk of domestic servitude.

Also see the Department of State’s Trafficking in Persons Report at www.state.gov/j/tip/rls/tiprpt/.

c. Prohibition of Child Labor and Minimum Age for Employment

In January 2016 the government raised the minimum age for work in shops, establishments, and factories to 14 years and set out special provisions for “youth employment” for those older than 14. Employees from 16 to 18 must have a certificate to authorize them to carry out “work fit for an adult.” The law prohibits employees younger than 18 from working in a hazardous environment.

Trained inspectors monitored the application of these new regulations, including with regard to child labor, but a general lack of resources hindered inspectors throughout the country. Inspectors from the MSWRR monitored child-related cases at 25 Township Community on the Rights of the Child projects throughout the country. The Ministry of Labor worked with UNICEF on problems related to child protection and minimum age and worked with the ILO to address child labor. Since 2014 a child labor working group met regularly, chaired by the minister of labor with representatives from government departments, the private sector, labor unions, and civil society. The government tasked a working group with drafting a national plan of action to implement ILO Convention 182 on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labor.

The Ministry of Labor worked with other ministries to collect better data on existing child labor and started a campaign directed at parents to raise awareness of the risks of child labor and provide information on other education options available to children. The Ministry of Labor engaged with the Ministry of Education on two programs, one aimed at bringing children out of the workplace and putting them in school, and another to support former child soldiers in pursuit of classroom education or vocational training. The labor ministry launched vocational schools to train young workers for jobs in nonhazardous environments. The government coordinated its efforts with the ILO in an effort to benefit directly 3,600 children and 1,000 households with education, worker safety, and support services in Mon State, Ayeyarwady Region, and Rangoon target areas.

The criminal penalties for recruiting child soldiers for military officials under martial law range from dismissal from service and imprisonment in civil prison to a fine of seven days’ pay (see section 1.g.). For civilians the law outlines penalties for child recruitment from a minimum 10 years’ to a maximum of life imprisonment. Penalties under the law and their enforcement for other child labor violations were insufficient to deter violations.

Child labor remained prevalent and highly visible. Children were at high risk, with poverty leading some parents to remove them from schools before completion of compulsory education. In cities children worked mostly as street vendors or refuse collectors, as restaurant and teashop attendants, and as domestic workers.

Children often worked in the informal economy, in some instances exposing them to drugs and petty crime, risk of arrest, commercial sexual exploitation, and HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases (also see section 6).

Children were vulnerable to forced labor in teashops, agriculture, and begging. In rural areas children routinely worked in family agricultural activities, occasionally in situations of forced labor.

d. Discrimination with Respect to Employment and Occupation

Labor laws and regulations do not specifically prohibit employment discrimination based on race, color, sex, religion, gender, political opinion, national origin or citizenship, social origin, disability, sexual orientation or gender identity, age, language, HIV-positive status or other communicable diseases, or social status.

Women remained underrepresented in most traditionally male occupations (mining, forestry, carpentry, masonry, and fishing) and were effectively barred from certain professions.

There were reports government and private actors practiced anti-Muslim discrimination that impeded Muslim-owned businesses’ operations and negatively affected their ability to hire and retain labor, maintain proper working standards, and secure public and private contracts. There were reports of discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity in employment, including the denial of promotions and firing of LGBTI persons. Activists reported job opportunities for many openly gay and lesbian persons were limited, and they noted a general lack of support from society as a whole. Activists reported that in addition to general societal discrimination, persons with HIV/AIDS faced employment discrimination in both the public and private sector, including suspensions and the loss of employment following positive results from mandatory workplace HIV testing.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The official minimum daily wage was 3,600 kyats ($2.70). The minimum wage covers a standard eight-hour workday across all sectors and industries and applies to all workers except for those in businesses with fewer than 15 employees. In December the government announced a committee of government, labor, and business representatives had agreed on increasing the minimum wage by 33 percent, subject to a 60-day comment period. The law requires the minimum wage to be revised every two years.

The law requires employers to pay employees on the date the salary is due for companies with 100 or fewer employees. For companies with more than 100 employees, the employer is required to pay employees within five days from the designated payday. Overtime cannot exceed 12 hours per workweek, should not go past midnight, and can exceed 16 hours in a workweek only on special occasions. The law also stipulates that an employee’s total working hours cannot exceed 11 hours per day (including overtime and a one-hour break). The law applies to shops, commercial establishments, and establishments for public entertainment.
The Labor Dispute Law stipulates the terms and conditions required for occupational safety, health, welfare, and productivity, but information was limited about whether workers can remove themselves from situations that endanger their health or safety without jeopardizing their employment.

The Ministry of Labor’s Factories and General Labor Laws Inspection Department oversees labor conditions in the private sector. Both resources and capacity constrained enforcement. During the year the number of labor law inspectors and factory inspectors under the ministry was insufficient to address adequately occupational safety and health standards, wage, salary, overtime, and other issues. In certain sectors other ministries regulated occupational safety and health laws, for example the Ministry of Agriculture, Livestock, and Irrigation.

The government and ILO announced plans for the country’s third labor stakeholders’ forum under the auspices of the multistakeholder Initiative to Promote Fundamental Labor Rights and Practices in Myanmar to take place in January 2018. As in previous years, the forum would invite more than 200 participants from the public and private sectors to discuss labor rights and various labor problems, including addressing freedom of association and collective bargaining, strengthening labor dispute settlement, and strengthening local capacity and institutions.

Enforcement of the laws generally took place in the public sector, but frequent violations occurred in private enterprises. Workers continued to submit complaints to relevant government agencies and the dispute settlement mechanism. Workers’ organizations alleged government inspections were rare and often announced with several days’ notice that allowed factory owners to bring facilities--often temporarily--into compliance. Corruption and bribery of inspectors reportedly occurred.

The social security board covers all employees in companies with more than five employees, with the exception of six sectors (government, international organizations, seasonal farming and fisheries, construction, nonprofit organizations, and domestic work). In practical terms the board covered primarily industrial zones, the location of the majority of registered workers, and therefore supported less than 1 percent of individuals involved in workplace accidents or casualties. While the board provided hospitals and clinics, it did not keep independently verifiable statistics on accidents or workplace violations. Observers assumed workers in other sectors of the economy had even less support, and no statistics on accidents or workplace violations were available.
EXHIBIT 6
Feature story

Vulnerability mapping to help sex workers in Bangladesh and Myanmar

12 January 2021

Warm smiles greet Lily as she approaches her first stop of the day—one of the 11 brothels scattered across the country that Lily, the President of the Bangladesh Sex Worker Network, visits quarterly to check in with the women and see what assistance they need. Though her visits have been limited in recent months due to movement restrictions to curb the spread of COVID-19, Lily knows well enough that those smiles are a brave front for the troubling times that her peers have experienced.

“I see the sex workers as my sisters—I feel their happiness and pain and I try my best to solve any issue they face,” Lily said. During the COVID-19 pandemic, Lily and the 29 community-based organizations serving sex workers in the country have struggled to respond to the increased calls for support. In March, government countrywide movement restrictions meant that sex workers could no longer have clients, leaving most of them without a source of income and unable to provide for themselves or their families.
Sex workers' children faced challenges during the COVID situation because their mothers couldn't arrange to provide them with food. When we [the Bangladesh Sex Worker Network] learned about this issue, we reached out to many organizations and the private sector for assistance,” explained Lily. Responding to the call to action, the network mobilized funds to support 2100 sex workers across the country. Community-led support in Bangladesh has also garnered global recognition. Most recently, a former sex worker, Rina Akter, was recognized by the BBC for her efforts (https://www.bbc.com/news/world-55042935), and those of her team of helpers, to serve 400 meals a week to sex workers in need.

“While a few sex workers had savings, most could not provide for themselves,” said Rahat Ara Nur, Technical Officer for the United Nations Population Fund in Bangladesh (https://bangladesh.unfpa.org/). “Through the United Nations Population Fund, we provided sex workers with COVID-19 prevention commodities, such as masks and handwashing materials, and we also developed public service announcements which were aired on community radio to ensure we raised awareness about COVID-19 precautionary measures among the community.”

With the closure of entertainment venues, a classification that includes brothels, some sex workers have resorted to street-based sex work, which increases the risk of violence, condom-less sex and no pay or low pay.

Sex workers are also experiencing increasing vulnerability to gender-based violence. Without a source of income, conflicts about finances arise, and sex worker networks report that their members have experienced abuse at the hands of their spouses, partners and brothel owners.

Some sex workers report that they have become homeless because the brothels have been closed, or in some cases the residents were evicted because rent could not be paid. Many sex workers cite stigma and discrimination as a barrier for other forms of employment. Health outreach services that once provided brothels with sexual and reproductive health services, including HIV testing and prevention, have been suspended due to travel restrictions.
These developments are not unique to Bangladesh, however. Throughout the Asia–Pacific region, national and regional networks of sex workers are reporting that the COVID-19 outbreak has exacerbated the inequalities faced by sex workers, and many are either not eligible or excluded from social protection services.

“There is no government support specifically targeting sex workers. There is support for the general public, particularly those that are low income, but sex workers are not eligible for these social protections because they work in the informal economy,” said Hnin Hnin Yu, the Chairperson of Sex Workers in Myanmar (SWiM), a nongovernmental advocacy group for sex workers’ rights.

Additionally, many sex workers are migrants (international or internal) and lack the necessary papers or registration with local authorities to access the government’s support. Eligibility criteria for social support, such as documentation of income, proof of residence, national identification, contribution to existing social protection schemes and filing taxes, are all reasons given for excluding sex workers from government support. An online consultation of female sex workers from across the country, organized by UNAIDS and SWiM, revealed that apart from limited funds from humanitarian actors, none of the sex workers had received social support.

“When Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria assistance for COVID-19 was allocated, funds for people living with HIV included the most vulnerable sex workers to receive food provisions,” said Mr Myo, Community Support Adviser for UNAIDS in Myanmar. “However, we recognized that this was an ad hoc solution that reached a small portion of the vulnerable population and there is a need for more sustainable support, such as social protection, for sex workers.”

It has become clear that focused support for sex workers must be prioritized. Recognizing that more needs to be known about the gaps in social protection for sex workers, UNAIDS in collaboration with the United Nations Population Fund and the World Food Programme are exploring the possibility of conducting a needs assessment and vulnerability mapping initiative of female sex workers during the COVID-19 pandemic. Data from the community-led mapping initiative will be used to inform programming for livelihood support, food security, improved access to antiretroviral therapy, sexual and reproductive health services and gender-based violence prevention and response services.

Commenting on the prospects of the United Nations agencies joining forces to coordinate a vulnerability mapping exercise with sex worker networks, Ms Nur expressed excitement about how this advocacy tool will not only help to identify the challenges that sex workers face during the COVID-19 outbreak, but it would also catalyse further work to mobilize resources for programmes and address injustices that pre-date the COVID-19 pandemic.

Hnin Hnin Yu cites discrimination and harassment from police as a long-standing challenge facing sex workers’ rights. During the COVID-19 outbreak, communities have reported increased police surveillance, harassment, including physical violence, and demands to pay fees to conduct sex work. In response, SWiM provides community-led, peer-to-peer legal aid for sex workers who have been arrested, educating them about their rights.

For those working closely with community-led organizations it has been inspiring to see that although sex worker networks and the sex workers they represent have seen challenges all around them, they have done their best to support their peers. There is hope that the data gathered in a vulnerability mapping exercise would not only generate the evidence needed to advocate for expanding the reach of social protection and humanitarian response services to be inclusive of sex workers, but could also inform the scale-up of community-led programming.
Vulnerability mapping to help sex workers in Bangladesh and Myanmar | UNAIDS

Hand sanitizer donated by Reckitt Benckiser to people living with HIV
(/en/resources/presscentre/featurestories/2021/january/20210115_reckitt-benckiser)
25 January 2021

Remembering Andrew Mosane, AIDS activist and progressive “radical” (/en/resources/presscentre/featurestories/2021/january/20210121_andrew-mosane)
21 January 2021
Vulnerability mapping to help sex workers in Bangladesh and Myanmar | UNAIDS

1/26/2021

Challenge the stigma, pursue your right to health (/en/resources/presscentre/featurestories/2021/january/20210120_Zim_srhr)
20 January 2021
HIV prevalence in the adult population aged 15 years and older was estimated at 0.54 per cent in 2014, a decline from 0.94 per cent in 2000. HIV in Myanmar is concentrated among key populations: people who inject drugs (23.1 per cent), men who have sex with men (6.6 per cent) and female sex workers (6.3 per cent).

Interventions to reach key populations began on a large scale after 2000 with condom and harm reduction programmes. The main focus is on prevention of HIV transmission with the concept of the three zeros: zero new infections, zero AIDS related deaths and zero discrimination for those living with HIV. Mapping exercises and size estimation are used to reach key populations through targeted outreach programmes, drop in centres, HIV testing, and referrals to antiretroviral treatment services.

The criminalisation of sex work and the carrying of condoms as circumstantial evidence have resulted in sex workers not accessing health and other social services for fear of being arrested. This increases both their personal vulnerability to HIV and other sexually transmitted infections, as well as that of their clients.

UNFPA Activities

The comprehensive condom programme is a key priority for UNFPA because condoms are recognized as the only effective way to prevent HIV as well as other sexually transmitted infections and unintended pregnancy. Operating through both public and private entry points such as health clinics and drop in centres, UNFPA helps provide a consistent and affordable supply of condoms.
UNFPA has been working on HIV prevention among key populations, in particular female sex workers and their clients, since 2004. Recognizing the importance of involving beneficiaries in managing activities that affect their own lives, UNFPA works to engage community-based, sex-worker-led organizations programme design, implementation and monitoring.

Programmes promote safe behaviour and demand-generation for services, along with provision of those very services: access to condoms and lubricants, referrals to STI/HIV testing, antiretroviral treatment and other reproductive health services such as birth spacing support and opportunistic infections prevention. Other activities include information, counselling, social support, and capacity development of peer educators.

In 2015, UNFPA supported the development of national guidelines for HIV prevention among key populations. UNFPA also supports facilities that integrate different types of sexual and reproductive health services such as family planning, maternal health and HIV.

Reference

* Global AIDS Response Progress Report Myanmar 2015, National AIDS Programme
EXHIBIT 8
The Socio-Economic Impact of People Living with HIV at the Household Level in Myanmar
The Socio-Economic Impact of People Living with HIV at the Household Level in Myanmar
ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

Donor partners:

This survey has been possible because of the generous support of the government of Australia, Finland, Sweden and the United Kingdom.

Disclaimer:

The views expressed in this publication do not necessarily represent those of UNDP or MoH.

Contacts:

National AIDS Program
Department of Public Health
Ministry of Health and Sports
Naypyitaw, Myanmar

United Nations Development Programme Myanmar
6 Natmauk Road, Tamwe Township
Yangon
Myanmar

Copyright: © UNDP and MoH 2016
All rights reserved

Manufactured in Myanmar

Cover image by Sanigest
The views expressed in this publication are those of the author(s). The analysis and recommendations of this report do not necessarily reflect the views of the United Nations or UNDP.\(^1\)

The designations employed and the presentation of material on the maps in this report do not imply the expression of any opinion whatsoever on the part of the United Nations or UNDP concerning the legal status of any country, territory, city or area or its authorities, or concerning the delimitation of its frontiers or boundaries.

\(^1\)This publication has been approved by the Ministry of Health’s Ethical Review Committee
Over the past decade, significant achievements have been made in addressing HIV in the country. The results are clear, with HIV prevalence falling by nearly 50 percent (from 0.94% in 2000 to 0.54% in 2014) and antiretroviral coverage estimated to reach 50 percent by 2016. These results are due to sustained and strong political leadership, generous donor support, and the tireless efforts of civil society, international non-governmental organizations and development partners.

Despite these important achievements, we recognize that there is an important unfinished agenda to ensure better access, quality and efficiency with the HIV program. This study demonstrates that HIV-affected households face a variety of economic and social challenges. HIV-affected households face higher health care costs and are often forced to draw on their savings, take on additional debt and reduce their spending in other critical areas such as food and education. It is well known that the health impacts of HIV are severe, with higher morbidity and mortality levels in HIV-affected households, affecting the social and economic threads of our country. But the study also shows that people living with HIV and their families often experience HIV-related discrimination, with resulting negative psychosocial outcomes.

Achieving the UNAIDS 90/90/90 goals will require that Myanmar builds on the momentum of the past decade, and expands efforts to ensure universal access to HIV prevention, treatment, care and support for People Living with HIV (PLHIV) and their families. This study brings a unique perspective to addressing the challenges of PLHIV by taking a holistic perspective of the impact of HIV by adding measurement of chronic diseases such as diabetes, mental illnesses and cancer. The results show that households affected by chronic disease may not endure as dramatic an income reduction as HIV-affected households but employment levels are reduced and internal stigma levels are high. At the same time, households affected by both HIV and a chronic disease are the most vulnerable of the households studied, implying additional support for those households will provide valuable social protection.

Within this context, this report examines the socio-economic impact of HIV at the household level in Myanmar, providing policy-makers with a rich evidence base upon which to strengthen existing impact mitigation strategies, introduce new interventions, and ensure resources are utilised effectively and efficiently. I believe that the valuable results of this study would inform the implementation of the Myanmar’s current National Strategic Plan on HIV and AIDS 2011-2016 as well as the new strategic plan.

On behalf of the National AIDS Programme, I wish to thank the United Nations Development Programme for supporting the study on the Socioeconomic Impact of HIV at the Household Level in Myanmar, as part of the UNDP Democratic Governance programme. I would also like to recognise the hard work and tenacity of the Burnet Institute, Sanigest Internacional throughout the implementation of this study.

DR HTUN NYUNT OO
Programme Manager
National AIDS Programme
Ministry of Health and Sports
Stigma, discrimination, and socio-economic exclusion continue to affect the rights and socio-economic opportunities of people living with HIV in Myanmar. Households with a family member who has HIV, have lower incomes, fewer assets and lower home-ownership, compared to households that are not affected by HIV. They also have more household debt, and their families pay a higher rate of interest compared to families not affected by HIV. There is a high proportion of HIV-affected households led by a single parent; they are particularly economically vulnerable. Children from families affected by HIV are more than twice as likely to have missed school to help their family with household chores or to carry out paid work.

Around a quarter of the households sampled for this report have at least one person who has a chronic disease. Compared to people with HIV, more people with a chronic disease cited bad health. Furthermore, more people with a chronic disease seek outpatient care and fewer are satisfied with their access to health services. In rural areas, the distance to the facility is an important reason why people with chronic illnesses do not seek care. Families with a member who has a chronic disease have higher levels of unemployment and are over two and a half times more likely to have medical bills that they cannot pay for, than families where no one has a chronic illness.

As Myanmar strives to implement the Sustainable Development Goals and the 2030 Agenda, the findings of this study will help inform policy discussions on how to meet SDG 3 on Good Health and Good Well-Being, and SDG 10 on Reducing Inequalities, and on how to improve the lives of vulnerable groups and especially those living with HIV/AIDS, through measures such as universal health coverage and social protection.
Finally, I would like to thank the more than 2,500 households across Myanmar, who gave their valuable time to participate in this important study.

PETER BATCHELOR
Country Director
UNDP Myanmar
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This report was written by James Cercone, Étoile Pinder, Michal Pothuis and Kathleen Lotmore of Sanigest Internacional, and Ben Coghlan and Poe Poe Aung of the Burnet Institute. Additional analytical assistance was provided by Silvia Molina, Tiera Ndlovu and Michal Pothuis of Sanigest. Dr Poe Poe Aung and Dr Ben Coghlan of the Burnet Institute designed the study sampling design and supervised collection of data. They were also supported by the Burnet Institute Myanmar research team - Aye Kyawt Paing, Swai Mon Oo, Zaw Win Thein, Kyaw Zayar Aung, Claire Ryan and Dr San Shwe.

The authors would like to thank Myanmar National AIDS Programme for their leadership and vision to welcome evidence from this socio-economic impact study in coordination with one of the three strategic priorities of Myanmar’s current National Strategic Plan on HIV and AIDS 2011-2016: Strategic Priority III – Mitigation of the impact of HIV on people living with HIV and their families. We also would like to take this opportunity to acknowledge the guidance and support of the Steering Committee members, including representatives from the Ministry of National Planning and Economic Development, Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief and Resettlement, Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security, UNAIDS, WHO and UNICEF.

The study would not have been possible without the commitment of Kazuyuki Uji from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) Asia-Pacific Regional Centre to ensure Myanmar’s participation in the broader regional study on the socio-economic impact of HIV at the household level, and for his support and contributions throughout the process.

We would like to acknowledge the support of the UNDP team in Myanmar, with particular thanks to Makiko Fujita, Dr Win Mar and Hyeran Kim, Jessica Price, Jennifer Andre as well as Nashida Rasheed, of UNDP Bangkok Regional Hub for their thoughtful comments on the draft. The International Organization for Migration is also gratefully acknowledged for their assistance.

We would also like to highlight the extensive effort of the NGO network – AMI, Consortium (Care), MDM, MSF Holland, MSF Swiss, and the Union - who kindly provided access to ART clinics and assisted the research team with the recruitment of participants.

We are grateful for the hard work of the supervisors from the Department of Medical Research and the enumerators from the Myanmar Positive Group (MPG) Network who undertook the fieldwork for this study. Their efforts resulted in the informative results seen throughout the report. Finally, thanks are given to the thousands of individuals throughout Myanmar who allowed their stories to be shared through this report.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Acronym</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>AIDS</td>
<td>Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ART</td>
<td>Antiretroviral Therapy</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CD</td>
<td>Chronic Diseases</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CI</td>
<td>Confidence Interval</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DMR</td>
<td>Department of Medical Research</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DOH</td>
<td>Department of Health</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FSW</td>
<td>Female Sex Workers</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GAR</td>
<td>Gross Attendance Rates</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GDP</td>
<td>Gross Domestic Product</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HBC</td>
<td>Home-Based Care</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HCT</td>
<td>HIV Counselling and Testing</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HIV</td>
<td>Human Immunodeficiency Virus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HH</td>
<td>Household</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HIV-CD-HH</td>
<td>Household with [a member living with HIV + another member living with a chronic disease] OR [a single member living with both HIV and a chronic disease]</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HH</td>
<td>HIV-affected household (Household with at least 1 member living with HIV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HH-NOCD</td>
<td>HIV households where no member is living with a chronic disease</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HoH</td>
<td>Head of Household</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HoHWCD</td>
<td>Head of Household Without a Chronic Disease</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICF</td>
<td>International Classification of Functioning, Disability and Health</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ISCO</td>
<td>International Standard Classification of Occupations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>KAP</td>
<td>Key Affected Population</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MOH</td>
<td>Ministry of Health</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MPG</td>
<td>Myanmar Positive Group</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MSM</td>
<td>Men who have Sex with Men</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MTCT</td>
<td>Mother-To-Child-Transmission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-CD-HH</td>
<td>Non-affected household with a member living with a chronic disease</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-HH</td>
<td>Non-affected household (Household with no members reported living with HIV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-HH-NOCD</td>
<td>Non-affected household where no member is living with a chronic disease</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NAP</td>
<td>National AIDS Programme</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NODX-INT</td>
<td>Head of household not diagnosed with a chronic disease or HIV who was interviewed about quality of life</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NAR</td>
<td>Net Attendance Rates</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSP</td>
<td>National Strategic Plan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OI</td>
<td>Opportunistic Infection</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OR</td>
<td>Odds Ratio</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OVC</td>
<td>Orphans and Vulnerable Children</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACRONYMS &amp; ABBREVIATIONS</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------------------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PLCD</td>
<td>Person/people Living with a Chronic Disease</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PLCD-INT</td>
<td>Person/people Living with a Chronic Disease interviewed specifically about their personal experience living with a chronic disease</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PLHIV</td>
<td>Person/people living with HIV</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PLHIVCD</td>
<td>Person/people living with HIV who is also living with a chronic disease</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PLHIV-INT</td>
<td>Person/people living with HIV interviewed specifically about their personal experience living with HIV</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PLNODX</td>
<td>People living with no diagnosis of HIV or a chronic disease</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PWID</td>
<td>People Who Inject Drugs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Q</td>
<td>Quintile</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>QOL</td>
<td>Quality of Life</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SES</td>
<td>Socio-Economic Status</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UNDP</td>
<td>United Nations Development Programme</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VCCT</td>
<td>Voluntary Confidential Counselling and Testing</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>YOA</td>
<td>Years of Age</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CONTENTS

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY 1

1. INTRODUCTION 3

2. METHODOLOGY AND DATA 10
   2.1 Sample and Survey Design 10
   2.2 Personnel, Data Collection and Data Entry 15
   2.3 Data Analysis 16
   2.4 Limitations to the Study 19

3. PROFILE OF SAMPLE HOUSEHOLDS AND PLHIV 21
   3.1 Profile of Sample Households 22
   3.2 Profile of the Heads of Households 22
   3.3 Economic Status of the Sample Households 25
   3.4 Profile of Interviewed PLHIV and PLCD 29

4. IMPACT OF HIV ON ECONOMIC FACTORS 40
   4.1 Employment and Productivity for PLHIV and PLCD 40
   4.2 HIV and Chronic Diseases Impact on the Need for Care-Giving 42
   4.3 Impact of HIV on Mortality and Income 43
   4.4 Impact of HIV on Household Revenues 44
   4.5 Impact of HIV on Dependency Ratios 49
   4.6 Impact of HIV on Levels of Household Consumption 50
   4.7 Coping Mechanisms: Impact of HIV on Household Debt 53

5. IMPACT OF HIV ON EDUCATION 57
   5.1 Impact of HIV on School Attendance 57
   5.2 Impact of HIV on School Absences and Grade Repetition 63

6. IMPACT OF HIV ON HEALTH 66
   6.1 Impact of HIV and Chronic Diseases on Household Health Status 67
   6.2 Impact of HIV on Behavioural Risk Factors 67
   6.3 Impact of HIV on Utilisation of Health Services 70
   6.4 Impact of HIV and Chronic Diseases on Out-of-Pocket Health Expenditures 74
   6.5 Impact of HIV on Source of Funds for Health Care Charges 76
   6.6 Catastrophic Health Expenditures 77
Contents

7. IMPACT OF HIV ON FOOD SECURITY .................................................. 80
   7.1 Impact of HIV on Hunger ......................................................... 80
   7.2 Impact of HIV on Households Receiving Food Support ............. 82

8. IMPACT OF HIV ON STIGMA, DISCRIMINATION AND QUALITY OF LIFE .................................................................................. 85
   8.1 Internal Stigma ......................................................................... 86
   8.2 Discrimination ......................................................................... 86
   8.3 Quality of Life .......................................................................... 87
   8.4 Disability Assessment ............................................................... 89

9. IMPACT OF HIV: SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS .................................. 91
   9.1 Impact of HIV on Widows .......................................................... 91
   9.2 Impact of HIV on Migration ...................................................... 93

10. KNOWLEDGE AND AWARENESS OF HIV ........................................ 96

11. POLICY CONCLUSIONS ................................................................. 101

REFERENCES ....................................................................................... 104

ANNEXES ............................................................................................. 107
   Annex A: List of Participating NGOs ............................................... 107
   Annex B: Summary of Participant Selection and Eligibility Criteria ... 108
   Annex C: Survey Instrument ........................................................... 109
   Annex D: Role and Responsibility of Team Members .................... 146
   Annex E: Training Agenda for Data Collection Team ....................... 148
   Annex F: Data Collection Personnel ............................................... 150
   Annex G: Sampling Process ............................................................ 151
LIST OF TABLES

TABLE 1: INCLUDED AND EXCLUDED ART CLINICS 11
TABLE 2: ART CLINICS SELECTED FOR SAMPLE* 12
TABLE 3: SUMMARY OF INCLUSION AND EXCLUSION CRITERIA 14
TABLE 4: QUINTILES OF ASSET-BASED APPROACH 18
TABLE 5: RECALL PERIODS FOR QUESTIONNAIRE TOPICS 20
TABLE 6: BASIC SOCIOECONOMIC AND DEMOGRAPHIC CHARACTERISTICS OF SAMPLE HOUSEHOLDS 23
TABLE 7: CHARACTERISTICS OF HEADS OF HOUSEHOLDS, BY LOCATION 24
TABLE 8: DISTRIBUTION OF HOUSEHOLDS BY THE STATUS OF BASIC AMENITIES 26
TABLE 9: CHARACTERISTICS OF INTERVIEWED PLHIV, BY LOCATION 30
TABLE 10: CHARACTERISTICS OF INTERVIEWED PLHIV, BY QUINTILE OF SOCIO-ECONOMIC STATUS 30
TABLE 11: CHARACTERISTICS OF PLCD, BY LOCATION 37
TABLE 12: CHARACTERISTICS OF PLCD, BY QUINTILE OF SOCIO-ECONOMIC STATUS 38
TABLE 13: NUMBER OF EARNERS PER HOUSEHOLD AND HOUSEHOLD DEPENDENCY RATIOS 50
TABLE 14: IMPACT OF HIV AND/OR CDS ON HOUSEHOLD SAVINGS, BY LOCATION 53
TABLE 15: IMPACT OF HIV ON CATASTROPHIC HEALTH EXPENDITURES* 78

LIST OF FIGURES

FIGURE 1: SUMMARY OF KEY SOCIO-ECONOMIC INDICATORS MEASURED IN THIS STUDY 1
FIGURE 2: COUNTRIES IN ASIA-PACIFIC WITH THE HIGHEST HIV BURDEN AND NEW INFECTION TRENDS 3
FIGURE 3: NUMBER OF PEOPLE ACCESSING ANTIRETROVIRAL TREATMENT 2003-2012 4
FIGURE 4: CONTINUUM OF CARE 5
FIGURE 7: INCIDENCE BY KEY POPULATIONS IN MYANMAR (1991–2015) 7
FIGURE 8: THE MICRO AND MACRO ECONOMIC IMPACT OF HIV 9
FIGURE 9: DISTRIBUTION OF DIAGNOSIS 17
FIGURE 10: DISTRIBUTION OF SAMPLE HOUSEHOLDS BY SOCIOECONOMIC QUINTILES 25
FIGURE 11: DISTRIBUTION OF SAMPLE HOUSEHOLDS BY SOCIOECONOMIC QUINTILES, BY SEX 25
FIGURE 12: DISTRIBUTION OF SAMPLE HOUSEHOLDS BY SOCIOECONOMIC QUINTILES, BY LOCATION 25
FIGURE 13: PERCENTAGE OF HOUSEHOLDS THAT OWN DWELLING, BY LOCATION 27
FIGURE 14: PERCENTAGE OF HOUSEHOLDS THAT OWN DWELLING, BY GENDER OF HOH 27
FIGURE 15: DISTRIBUTION OF HOUSEHOLDS BY ASSET OWNERSHIP: PERCENTAGE OF HOUSEHOLDS THAT OWN A LAND PLOT 27
FIGURE 16: DISTRIBUTION OF HOUSEHOLD ASSET OWNERSHIP 28
FIGURE 17: DISTRIBUTION OF ASSET OWNERSHIP FOR NA-HHS, BY CHRONIC DISEASE STATUS 28
FIGURE 18: MODE OF DETERMINING HIV STATUS, BY LOCATION 31
FIGURE 19: MODE OF DETERMINING HIV STATUS, BY QUINTILE 31
FIGURE 20: MODE OF DETERMINING HIV STATUS, BY STATES / REGIONS 32
| FIGURE 21: | MODE OF HIV TRANSMISSION, BY SEX | 32 |
| FIGURE 22: | MODE OF HIV TRANSMISSION, BY QUINTILE | 33 |
| FIGURE 23: | YEARS SINCE DIAGNOSIS, BY LOCATION | 34 |
| FIGURE 24: | YEARS SINCE DIAGNOSIS, BY QUINTILE | 34 |
| FIGURE 25: | STAGE OF INFECTION, BY LOCATION | 36 |
| FIGURE 26: | STAGE OF INFECTION, BY QUINTILE | 36 |
| FIGURE 27: | UNEMPLOYMENT OF WORKING AGE HH MEMBERS | 41 |
| FIGURE 28: | UNEMPLOYMENT OF WORKING AGE MEMBERS, BY GENDER | 41 |
| FIGURE 29: | PERCENTAGE EMPLOYED HOUSEHOLD MEMBERS MISSED DAY OF WORK | 41 |
| FIGURE 30: | IMPACT OF HEALTH STATUS ON REASONS FOR MISSING WORK | 41 |
| FIGURE 31: | PERCENTAGE OF PLHIV AND PLCD REPORTING THEY REQUIRE A CAREGIVER | 42 |
| FIGURE 32: | % OF THOSE REQUIRING WHO RECEIVED CAREGIVING ASSISTANCE | 43 |
| FIGURE 33: | PROFILES OF THE CAREGIVERS | 43 |
| FIGURE 34: | PERCENTAGE OF HHS WITH DEATH IN PREVIOUS 12 MONTHS | 43 |
| FIGURE 35: | PERCENTAGE OF HOUSEHOLDS THAT LOST AN INCOME-EARNING MEMBER IN PREVIOUS YEAR | 43 |
| FIGURE 36: | AVERAGE PER CAPITA HOUSEHOLD INCOME (000s) | 44 |
| FIGURE 37: | SOURCE OF TOTAL HOUSEHOLD REVENUES, BY LOCATION | 45 |
| FIGURE 38: | SOURCE OF TOTAL HOUSEHOLD REVENUES, BY QUINTILE | 46 |
| FIGURE 39: | SOURCE OF PER CAPITA INCOME, BY LOCATION (000s) | 47 |
| FIGURE 40: | SOURCE OF PER CAPITA INCOME BY LOCATION IN PERCENTAGE | 47 |
| FIGURE 41: | PER CAPITA ANNUAL REVENUE, GENDER (000s) | 48 |
| FIGURE 42: | SOURCE OF PER CAPITA INCOME, BY QUINTILE | 48 |
| FIGURE 43: | IMPACT OF HIV ON HOUSEHOLD TOTAL ANNUAL CONSUMPTION EXPENDITURE, BY LOCATION | 51 |
| FIGURE 44: | IMPACT OF HIV ON CONSUMPTION PATTERNS, BY QUINTILE | 51 |
| FIGURE 45: | MAIN AREAS OF CONSUMPTION REDUCTION AMONG HIV-HH AND NA-CD-HHS | 52 |
| FIGURE 46: | IMPACT OF HIV ON REASONS FOR HOUSEHOLD DEBT, BY SEX | 54 |
| FIGURE 47: | IMPACT OF HIV ON REASONS FOR HOUSEHOLD DEBT, BY LOCATION | 54 |
| FIGURE 48: | IMPACT OF HIV ON SOURCE OF DEBT AND INTEREST RATES, BY LOCATION | 55 |
| FIGURE 49: | SOURCE OF DEBT, BY SEX OF HOH | 55 |
| FIGURE 50: | IMPACT OF HIV ON HOUSEHOLD DEBT, BY QUINTILE | 56 |
| FIGURE 51: | THE EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM IN MYANMAR | 58 |
| FIGURE 52: | IMPACT OF HIV ON MALES’ CURRENT SCHOOL ATTENDANCE, BY AGE | 59 |
| FIGURE 53: | IMPACT OF HIV ON FEMALES’ CURRENT SCHOOL ATTENDANCE, BY AGE | 59 |
| FIGURE 54: | IMPACT OF HIV ON CHILDREN WHO HAVE NEVER ATTENDED SCHOOL | 60 |
| FIGURE 55: | IMPACT OF HIV ON PRIMARY SCHOOL NET ATTENDANCE RATES, BY SEX | 61 |
| FIGURE 56: | IMPACT OF HIV ON SECONDARY SCHOOL NET ATTENDANCE RATES, BY SEX | 61 |
| FIGURE 57: | IMPACT OF HIV ON NET ATTENDANCE RATES (NAR), BY EDUCATIONAL LEVEL AND LOCATION | 62 |
| FIGURE 58: | IMPACT OF HIV ON REASONS FOR NON-ATTENDANCE, BY SEX | 62 |
| FIGURE 59: | IMPACT OF HIV ON SCHOOL ABSENCES, BY SEX OF HOH | 63 |
| FIGURE 60: | IMPACT OF HIV ON SCHOOL ABSENCES, BY AGE OF CHILD | 64 |
| FIGURE 61: | IMPACT OF HIV ON GRADE REPETITION | 64 |
| FIGURE 62: | REPORTED HEALTH STATUS OF HOUSEHOLD MEMBERS, BY SEX | 67 |
| FIGURE 63: | REPORTED HEALTH STATUS OF HOUSEHOLD MEMBERS, BY LOCATION | 68 |
| FIGURE 64: | REPORTED HEALTH STATUS OF HOUSEHOLD MEMBERS, BY QUINTILE | 68 |
| FIGURE 65: | TOBACCO USE BY SEX | 69 |
FIGURE 66: UTILISATION OF AMBULATORY HEALTH CARE SERVICES IN THE PREVIOUS 4 WEEKS, BY SEX
FIGURE 67: PERCENTAGE OF HOUSEHOLD UTILIZING OP SERVICES IN PAST 4 WEEKS, BY GENDER OF HOH
FIGURE 68: LOCATION OF OP PROVIDER
FIGURE 69: UTILISATION OF AMBULATORY HEALTH CARE SERVICES IN THE PREVIOUS 4 WEEKS, BY QUINTILE
FIGURE 70: REASONS FOR NOT SEEKING CARE WHEN SICK, BY LOCATION
FIGURE 71: REASONS FOR NOT SEEKING CARE WHEN SICK, BY SEX
FIGURE 72: INPATIENT UTILISATION
FIGURE 73: IMPACT OF HIV ON SATISFACTION WITH ACCESS TO HEALTH SERVICES
FIGURE 74: IMPACT OF HIV ON AMBULATORY CHARGES, BY SEX OF HOH AND LOCATION
FIGURE 75: IMPACT OF HIV ON INPATIENT HEALTH CARE CHARGES, BY SEX OF HOH
FIGURE 76: IMPACT OF HIV ON SOURCE OF FUNDS FOR AMBULATORY HEALTH CARE COSTS, BY LOCATION
FIGURE 77: UTILISATION OF ART AND MEDICATIONS FOR OI, BY LOCATION
FIGURE 78: UTILISATION OF MEDICATIONS, BY QUINTILE
FIGURE 79: UTILISATION OF MEDICATIONS FOR OI, BY STAGE OF INFECTION AND LOCATION
FIGURE 80: IMPACT OF HIV AND CDS ON MEMBERS "NOT EATING BECAUSE THERE WAS NOT ENOUGH FOOD", BY SEX
FIGURE 81: IMPACT OF HIV AND CDS ON MEMBERS "NOT EATING BECAUSE THERE WAS NOT ENOUGH FOOD", BY LOCATION
FIGURE 82: % OF MEMBERS THAT REPORTED BEING HUNGRY, BY TYPE OF HOUSEHOLD AND SEX OF HOH
FIGURE 83: % OF MEMBERS THAT REPORTED BEING HUNGRY, BY MEMBER'S DISEASE STATUS AND SEX OF HOH
FIGURE 84: IMPACT OF HIV ON FREQUENCY OF HUNGER, BY QUINTILE
FIGURE 85: TYPE OF FOOD SUPPORT RECEIVED
FIGURE 86: IMPACT OF HIV ON HOUSEHOLDS RECEIVING FOOD SUPPORT, BY QUINTILE
FIGURE 87: FOOD SUPPORT FOR HIV-AFFECTED HOUSEHOLDS, BY STATE / REGION
FIGURE 88: CONCEPTUAL FRAMEWORK FOR STIGMA, DISCRIMINATION AND INTERNAL STIGMA
FIGURE 89: ACTIONS MOTIVATED BY INTERNAL STIGMA
FIGURE 90: IMPACT OF HIV AND CDS ON QUALITY OF LIFE (QOL) AND DESPAIR, ANXIETY AND DEPRESSION*
FIGURE 91: IMPACT OF HIV AND CDS ON BEING DEPRESSED OR ANXIOUS*
FIGURE 92: IMPACT OF HIV AND CDS ON SATISFACTION LEVELS WITH HEALTH
FIGURE 93: IMPACT OF HIV AND CDS ON SENSE OF FINANCIAL SECURITY AND MOBILITY
FIGURE 94: WHODAS SCORE
FIGURE 95: IMPACT OF HIV ON WIDOW PROPERTY TRANSFER RIGHTS
FIGURE 96: IMPACT OF HIV ON HOUSEHOLD MIGRATION
FIGURE 97: MIGRATION DESTINATION
FIGURE 98: REASON FOR MIGRATION
FIGURE 99: KNOWLEDGE OF HIV PREVENTION METHODS
FIGURE 100: HIV TESTING KNOWLEDGE AND BEHAVIOURS, BY LOCATION
FIGURE 101: HIV TESTING LEVELS, BY SEX
FIGURE 102: HIV TESTING LEVELS, BY QUINTILE
FIGURE 103: KNOWLEDGE OF TESTING BY SEX
FIGURE 104: PERCENTAGE OF PEOPLE WHO KNEW WHERE TO GET TESTED
The National AIDS Programme (NAP) launched its report ‘The Socio-economic Impact of HIV at the Household Level in Myanmar,’ a report of a nationwide cross-sectional comparative study which was conducted with support from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). The report highlights a variety of economic and social challenges that are faced by HIV-affected households and provides recommended changes in social and health services to protect those households.

This study is part of a UNDP regional initiative to map the socio-economic impact of HIV on households throughout Asia. Survey modules covered key socio-economic indicators affected by HIV including: household members’ educational levels, employment status, health status, and engagement in risky behaviours; household consumption and income patterns, migration patterns and food security status; family composition; gender considerations; stigma and discrimination, quality of life measures, and measures of functional disability. This broad purview provides multi-dimensional information that can aid in identifying root causes, determining the epidemic’s impact on households and how households respond to these social and economic challenges, analysing the broader impacts of HIV and considering the policies and programs that best address these concerns.

The report aims to detail the socio-economic impact of HIV at the household level in Myanmar, to provide a basis upon which to design better mitigation strategies, and to inform policy dialogues on social protection of the marginalized population. For example, the report revealed average per capita household income for HIV-affected households (858,624MMK or US$768) was substantially lower than for non-affected households (901,564MMK or US$807) with non-affected households deriving more income from a diverse range of sources (trade/business/petty shops and sale of land or buildings).
Annual per capita household out-of-pocket health expenditures for HIV-affected households are almost double those of non-affected households (304,558MMK/US$272 vs. 163,405MMK/US$146). Children in non-affected households had marginally higher aggregate attendance rate for schooling at all levels (total 84.2%) than children in HIV-affected households (total 81.4%); the biggest difference in attendance rates for boys was among those in upper secondary school (14-18 years) (60.4% with non-affected households, 53.7% with HIV-affected households) while for girls it was among those in lower secondary school (10-13 years) (96.0% with non-affected households, 91.1% with HIV-affected households).

This study is unique as it also explores differences in socio-economic costs between households affected by HIV and those affected by chronic diseases such as diabetes, hypertension and chronic cardiac conditions. The study also revealed socio-economic impacts of various factors on people living with chronic diseases. People living with chronic diseases (PLCD) were significantly more likely to be unemployed (of household members between the ages of 15 and 64) than people living with HIV (PLHIV) and PLHIV or a chronic disease (PLNODX) (34.6%, 27.3% and 13.7%). Those without a chronic disease or HIV were regarded as having the best health (86% were in good or very good health), while PLCD were most likely to report being in bad or very bad health (17.4%). Surprisingly PLCD experience just as much and for some aspects considerably more internal stigma than PLHIV. Over 14% of PLHIV in Myanmar (cf. 10% in Cambodia) and 30% of PLCD reported they stopped work because of their illness. Opportunities for job promotion (13.6% PLHIV vs. 30.1% people living with chronic diseases) and education (15.9% PLHIV vs. 17.8% PLCD) were missed. A majority of PLHIV and PLCD avoided getting married (64.3% PLHIV vs. 58.8% PLCD), and small proportions kept away from the local clinic (9.0% PLHIV vs. 5.9% PLCD) and hospital (7.0% PLHIV vs. 6.7% PLCD) even when they needed care.

The report provides policy-makers and programme managers with a rich evidence base on which to strengthen existing impact mitigation strategies, introduce new interventions, and ensure resources are utilized effectively and efficiently. The report highlights the policy conclusions with recommended changes in the scope of services, depth of services and breadths of services, including; integration of targeted HIV impact mitigation programming into “HIV Sensitive” social protection strategies; importance of providing support for chronic disease prevention and management, particularly tobacco cessation for males, in combination with integrated HIV care; integration of prevention and control of chronic diseases as part of comprehensive HIV response across different levels; improved legal protection strategies including legal literacy and access to justice for PLHIV to mitigate the study’s result showing high eviction rates for HIV-HHs; Expansion of the definition of vulnerable groups in the Social Protection Strategy to include PLHIV specifically and; strengthened coordination with the private sector to maximize inclusion of the population that seeks HCT and other services in the private sector.
CHAPTER 1
INTRODUCTION

BACKGROUND

This study of the socio-economic impact of Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) on households in the Republic of the Union of Myanmar aims to support evidence-informed policymaking and programming related to health and social protection. An estimated 189,000 people are living with HIV in Myanmar, which equates to the fifth largest HIV population in the Asia Pacific region (UNAIDS, 2013) (Figure 2). This region is home to 4.7 million of the 35.3 million people living with HIV worldwide. Just twelve countries, including Myanmar, account for more than 90% of new HIV infections in Asia and the Pacific (UNAIDS, 2013b; UNAIDS, 2013). Although there have been improvements across the region with a decline in new infections, expansion of treatment services and reductions in HIV related mortality, countries face challenges in providing services to the increasing number of people living with HIV.

Globally, the impact of HIV on poverty – at the individual, household and national levels – is clear. In recent years, several studies have examined the socio-economic conditions of HIV-affected households (HIV-HHs) noting additional financial drains when compared to unaffected households and a disproportionate burden on poorer households (UNDP, 2006, 2009, 2009b). “Every death from AIDS represents the loss of income of almost USD 5000— the equivalent of nearly 14 years of income for people earning USD 1 per day at current prices” (UNAIDS, 2008). Healthcare expenses, costs associated with funerals, migration, and unemployment as well as a loss of income from reduced productivity and family members leaving the workforce to care for HIV-affected relatives can all lead families to sell assets and take on loans, often at higher than normal interest rates.

Figure 2: Countries in Asia-Pacific with the Highest HIV Burden and new Infection Trends

Source: UNAIDS, 2013

2 The Asia-Pacific region is comprised of Cambodia, China, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Myanmar, Nepal, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, the Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam.
Health and education investments are reduced and children, especially girls, may be forced to work or act as a caregiver to an HIV-positive family member. For instance, net school attendance was markedly lower for upper secondary school age girls in Cambodia from HIV-HHs compared with those from non-affected HHs (9% vs. 16%).3 Reduced educational attainments can influence future HIV prevalence – UNAIDS noted that seven million cases of HIV could be prevented in the next decade if every child receives an education (UNAIDS, 2011).

People Living with HIV (PLHIV) commonly have a poorer quality of life and higher levels of depression and anxiety compared to their peers. Stigma and discrimination can impede access to medical treatment, delay diagnosis and treatment, and make HIV-positive people less likely to disclose their HIV status; these are factors associated with HIV transmission.

The economic costs of HIV go beyond individuals and households affecting businesses and the government (UN, 2004). Sick employees supply fewer hours to the labour market and are less efficient than healthy workers, and labour supply decreases when household caregivers leave the workforce. HIV infection reduces fertility with long-term effects on population growth and fewer people contributing to the economy. Children orphaned by HIV create new economic burdens on surviving family members and the state. And government subsidized HIV medical expenditures, particularly for ART and treatment of opportunistic infections (OIs), place stress on the state budget. While ART treatment has expanded within the Asia Pacific region, scale-up has slowed from a 20% increase in treatment in the years 2010-2011, to a 13% increase from 2011-2012 (UNAIDS, 2013).

---

1 UNDP 2009. Socio-economic impact of HIV at the household level in Cambodia.

OVERVIEW OF THE RESPONSE TO HIV IN MYANMAR

In Myanmar, 0.47% of residents aged ≥15 years are now living with HIV. This is a decline from 0.94% in 2000. Prevalence among at-risk populations - female sex workers (FSW), men who have sex with men (MSM), people who inject drugs (PWID) - remains high although declines have also been documented: HIV prevalence among FSWs was 8.1% in 2013 down from 9.6% in 2011 and among PWID prevalence declined from 21.9% to 18.7%. In contrast, more MSM are now HIV positive, with an increase from 7.8% in 2011 to 10.4% in 2013 (UNAIDS, 2014).

The HIV incidence rate in Myanmar peaked in 1999 at over 30,000 new infections per year, but has steadily declined to the current level of around 7,000 new infections per year (see below). This pattern is attributed to both a prevention of new infections and the scale-up of antiretroviral treatment from the late 2000s (UNAIDS, 2014). New infections are occurring among a diverse range of people including all high-risk groups as well as low-risk women and men. This is a pronounced difference from the late 1990s when the majority of new infections were among PWID and FSWs and their clients (Figure 6). Low-risk women now contribute the second high-
Figure 5: Prevalence in Myanmar General Population, 15+ (1991-2015)

Source: UNAIDS, 2014

Figure 6: Distribution of new infections among key populations in Myanmar (1991–2015)

Source: UNAIDS, 2014
est number of new infections (Figure 7) of which 90% are acquired from their long-term partner (husband or boyfriend) (UNAIDS, 2009). Most HIV in Myanmar is transmitted through sexual intercourse (77% of new infections in 2010); however, there remain a small number of infections transmitted from mother-to-child (<300 new infections per year) (UNAIDS, 2014). Most people in Myanmar are unaware that HIV can be transmitted this way. In 2013, 37% of PLHIV were women and 15,000 people were estimated to have died of AIDS-related illnesses (UNAIDS, 2014).

Myanmar has made considerable progress in the areas of HIV prevention, care and treatment, and impact mitigation (Myanmar MoH, 2011; UNAIDS, 2014), which contributed to reductions in HIV prevalence. Figure 3 outlines the care, treatment, and support services that are available to people living with HIV (Myanmar MoH, 2011).

By the end of 2014, 85,626 people were receiving ART (NAP, 2015), although only 40% of those living with HIV have access to treatment. AIDS and related causes - projected to cause 11,400 deaths in 2015 (UNAIDS, 2014; UNDP, n.d.) - are expected to decrease with a commitment by the Myanmar Minister of Health to increase funding for HIV treatment by USD5 million to improve treatment coverage to 85% (UNAIDS, 2014b). Myanmar is also focused on reducing HIV transmission via opioid substitution therapy and needle-syringe exchange programmes (UNAIDS, 2014b).

The National AIDS Programme (NAP) under the Ministry of Health (MOH) leads the country’s response to the HIV/AIDS epidemic. The National Strategic Plan (NSP) 2011-2016 has three main objectives:
1. Reduction of HIV transmission and vulnerability particularly by people at highest risk;

2. Improvement of the quality and length of the life of people living with HIV through treatment, care and support;

3. Mitigation of the social, cultural and economic impacts of the epidemic.

The NSP includes strategies for achieving these objectives and targets to measure progress.

OVERVIEW OF THIS STUDY

This study is part of a UNDP regional initiative to map the socio-economic impact of HIV on households throughout Asia. The Burnet Institute and Sanigest Internacional carried out the work under the coordination of UNDP Myanmar. Survey modules covered key socio-economic indicators affected by HIV: income, employment, revenues, expenses, consumption, education, health, family composition, gender considerations, stigma and discrimination (The Kaiser Family Foundation, 2007). This broad purview provides multi-dimensional information that can aid in identifying root causes, determining the epidemic’s impact on households and how households respond to these social and economic challenges, analysing the broader impacts of HIV and considering the policies and programs that best address these concerns. The instruments were designed to ensure data would be comparable to data from prior surveys.

Unlike previous studies, however, this study also explores differences in socio-economic costs between households affected by HIV and those affected by chronic diseases such as diabetes, hypertension and chronic cardiac conditions. Nationally representative data on the impacts of chronic diseases on households are lacking for Myanmar and are needed to inform the new strategic plan for national social protection.

In this context, the report aims to detail the socio-economic impact of HIV at the household level in Myanmar, to provide a basis upon which to design better mitigation strategies, and to inform policy dialogues on social protection of the marginalized population. The study was designed with a focus on greater engagement and empowerment of the community, with community member involvement occurring throughout the study, from inception, to design, and survey to finalization.

The Report has twelve sections, including this introduction and overview of HIV in the country. Section Two covers the survey design, sampling methodology and data analysis. Section Three provides an overview of household characteristics, including Head of Household and PLHIV, as well as a profile of an interviewed PLHIV. Section Four details the impact of HIV on economic indicators, including but not limited to income, employment, debt, consumption and savings. Section Five focuses on education. Section Six covers HIV’s impact on health, including status, utilisation and costs. Section Seven examines the impact of HIV on food security, including hunger and food support. Section Eight examines stigma, discrimination and internal stigma as well as quality of life. Section Nine looks at the special considerations of HIV’s im-impact, such as its effects on family structures, orphans and vulnerable children, widows, migration, home-based care and key affected populations (KAPs). Section Ten ends the analyses and examines differences in knowledge and awareness regarding HIV. Section Eleven focuses on policy conclusions based on the report’s results, and the final section contains a list of the reference used throughout the report. Seven annexes list the participating NGOs, team members, the survey instrument, additional methodological information, and statistical details.

Figure 8: The Micro and Macro Economic Impact of HIV

Source: Cercone, J. from UNDP, 2009c
CHAPTER 2
METHODOLOGY & DATA

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- The study employed a cross-sectional comparative design using a multi-stage cluster sampling methodology to randomly select households with a resident living with HIV and households where no resident had HIV;
- Small clinics and insecure areas were excluded from selection; however, these represented <6% of all PLHIV registered at ART clinics in Myanmar;
- 30 urban and 30 rural townships throughout the country were surveyed;
- PLHIV were recruited as they attended ART clinics; comparison households were geographically matched to HIV-affected households and recruited separately;
- Information about chronic diseases and disabilities were collected from comparison households to allow comparisons of socio-economic costs with households affected by HIV.

2.1. SAMPLE AND SURVEY DESIGN

2.1.1. Study design

This study was a nationwide cross-sectional comparative study that used multi-stage cluster sampling to select participants. The design was based on earlier UNDP studies in the region and represents a balance between ensuring that the data collection did not result in harm for participants, that the study could be completed within a set budget and timeframe, and that the sample recruited was as close to nationally representative as possible.

2.1.2. Sampling methodology

The sample size was calculated based on the following parameters: (i) available data from similar UNDP studies conducted in Asia (Cambodia, China, India, Viet Nam) to ensure the study had sufficient power to detect differences between HIV-affected households and non-affected households (comparison households) for important socio-economic factors; (ii) stratification by urban and rural status; and (iii) 10% inflation to allow for refusals. In all, we aimed to survey a minimum of 2,200 households (1,100 HIV-affected households and 1,100 non-affected house-

---

4 Socio-economic outcome figures reported in the previous five Asian HIV socio-economic impact studies and used to calculate the sample size included a median estimated odds ratio observed for binary outcomes of 1.7 and a median prevalence of the socio-economic impact of interest in control households of 8.9%.

5 The Myanmar Positive Group (MPG) advised that a refusal rate higher than 10% was unlikely given previous survey experience with members.
This amounted to 19 cases and 19 comparisons in each of 60 clusters, which is described in detail below.

First Stage of Sampling: Selection of ART clinics

Government (NAP) and private (NGOs) ART clinics have registers of PLHIV who are currently receiving treatment. There are 135 ART clinics throughout Myanmar; 87 run by NAP and 48 by NGOs. All states and divisions have at least one ART clinic. Together, these clinics have registered 69,509 patients on treatment for HIV, although many more patients not yet eligible for ART also attend these clinics.

This register does not include those who know they are living with HIV but have not sought healthcare and those unaware of the infection; however, this is the only sampling frame available at the national-level for PLHIV in Myanmar. Households where a resident with HIV had already died were also not included for selection unless another household member was also HIV positive and registered at the local ART clinic.

We excluded clinics that were inaccessible due to insecurity and those that had too few patients to recruit the required sample within the survey period (Table 1). These exclusions amounted to 5.7% of all PLHIV registered by ART clinics in Myanmar.

From the remaining sampling frame of ART clinics, we allocated 26 clusters with a probability proportional to the number of patients registered at each clinic. An additional four clusters were purposely selected to improve the geographic coverage of the study. In all, 30 clusters were allocated to ART clinics.

Second Stage of Sampling: Selection of township (clusters)

The township of residence for each PLHIV was available from the selected ART clinics, allowing lists to be drawn up of the number of patients from each township attending each ART clinic. We opted to sample a limited number of townships, as it was impractical to visit all townships covered by an ART clinic. Townships were stratified by urban and rural status based on government classifications. One urban and one rural township were randomly selected with a probability proportional to the number of registered patients from each ART clinic giving a total of 60 clusters sampled for the study shows the distribution of townships sampled during the study.

2.1.3. Replacement of ART clinics during data collection

Two clinics originally selected were replaced during the survey:

- HlaingTharYar MSF-H clinic, HlaingTharYar Township, Yangon region: this clinic had closed, with most clients transferred to Insein Township MSF-H clinic. As Insein Township MSF-H clinic had already been randomly selected, an additional cluster was assigned to account for the new cases moved across from HlaingTharYar.

- PharKant MSF-H clinic, Kachin state: Security conditions precluded visiting this clinic. A new clinic was randomly selected proportional to population size

---

Table 2: ART Clinics Selected for Sample

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State / Division</th>
<th>ART Clinic</th>
<th># urban clusters</th>
<th># rural clusters</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Ayeyarwaddy</td>
<td>Pathein General Hospital</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bago</td>
<td>Consortium*</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kachin</td>
<td>Bhamo General Hospital</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>MSF-H</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kayin</td>
<td>Hpaan General Hospital*</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Magway</td>
<td>Pakokku General Hospital-IHC</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mandalay</td>
<td>Mandalay General Hospital-IHC</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Central Women Hospital-IHC</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Decentralized site-NAP/IHC</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Myingyan General Hospital-IHC*</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mon</td>
<td>IOM</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sagaing</td>
<td>Monywa General Hospital-IHC</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Sagaing General Hospital-IHC*</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shan-North</td>
<td>Iashio General Hospital-IHC</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>MSF-H</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shan-South</td>
<td>Taunggyi Saosuntun Hospital-IHC</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Taninthary</td>
<td>MSF-CH</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yangon</td>
<td>MSF-H</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Mingalardon Specialist Hospital</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>MDM</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Thakata Specialist Hospital-IHC</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>MSF-H</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>AMI</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Sites purposefully selected
Third Stage of Sampling: selection of cases and comparisons

SELECTION OF HIV-AFFECTED HOUSEHOLDS (CASE HOUSEHOLDS)

Recruitment: PLHIV were consecutively recruited from ART clinics as they attended the facility until at least 19 patients from the selected township had consented to participate (teams found that often more than 19 cases had to be recruited at clinics because some participants gave false addresses). This process aimed to minimise the risk of inadvertent disclosure of their HIV status and enabled recruitment of a mixed group of PLHIVs in each township including people on ART, people eligible but awaiting ART, and those newly diagnosed (PLHIVs who are ineligible for ART are not routinely followed up by ART clinics and are expected to compose only a minority of the sample).

It was not possible to randomly select participants because clinic rules forbid sharing even non-identifiable patient lists. Also, phone coverage in Myanmar is poor and few participants could be safely contacted in advance to consent to participate in the study.

According to participant preference, patients were either interviewed on the same day of recruitment in a private room at the clinic or on a later date in a safe, private location near their home. Volunteers working in the ART clinics or from local community-based organisations of the Myanmar Positive Group (MPG) network helped in the initial recruitment process to confirm that patients were eligible for the study. These volunteers assist from eligible Kachin clinics. The study team had already deployed to Kachin and it was impractical to randomly select a new clinic from the national list. Bhamo MSF-H clinic was selected which had similar features to the replaced clinic: a private clinic run by MSF-Holland with a similar number of registered patients and serving a population of a similar socio-economic status (SES) according to health authorities. medical and nursing staff to provide care to attendees and are well known to registered patients.

Eligibility criteria: Volunteers screened patients to check their eligibility with 3 questions: (i) are they from an eligible township; (ii) are they aged 18 years or over; (iii) are they interested in participating in the study.

The study team supervisor then determined final eligibility by also assessing whether: (iv) the patient was the head of household; (v) they had disclosed their HIV status to their family; (vi) they were willing to provide an exact address; and (vii) if anyone else in their household had already participated in the study. The supervisor explained the purpose of the study and obtained informed consent.

Table 3 summarises the inclusion and exclusion criteria. Basic demographic data (age, sex) for those eligible but who refused to participate was collected.

Definition of Head of Household: If the PLHIV was not the Head of their Household (HoH), surveyors arranged to also interview the head of household to gather the best possible information on the household economic situation. The HoH was defined as the principal ‘breadwinner’ for the family (not the eldest resident as recorded by national data systems), as this person was expected to know the most about household income, assets and expenditures. Interviews with HoHs were arranged through the PLHIV and conducted in a safe, private location near their home.

SELECTION OF NON-AFFECTED HOUSEHOLDS (COMPARISON HOUSEHOLDS)

Recruitment: Comparison households were crudely geographically matched to cases: a household located 3-5 houses away from the house of each case and made of similar materials was randomly selected. Midwives from each township health department have excellent knowledge of the local area through home visits and assisted in identifying the address of the case household and selection of the comparison household.

Surveyors interviewed heads of comparison households in their home after obtaining informed consent.

Eligibility criteria: Comparison households were excluded if any resident had HIV or tuberculosis (age matching of the head of the household member already participated in study | Head of Household | Disclosed HIV status to family | Eligible for recruitment
---|---|---|---|---
No | No | No | Yes | No
No | No | No | No | No
Yes | Yes | Yes | No | No
Yes | Yes | No | Yes | Yes
Yes | Yes | No | Yes | Yes
Yes | Yes | No | Yes | Yes

Table 3: Summary of Inclusion and Exclusion Criteria case and comparison households was done in some of the other Asian studies but was not employed in this study). For a summary of eligibility criteria see Annex B.

2.1.4. Survey Non-Response Rate

106 of 1,361 (7.8%) PLHIV who attended ART clinics during the study period and met the eligibility criteria declined to participate. More women (n=84; 11.5%) refused than men (n=22; 3.5%). Only a handful of comparison households refused mostly in urban areas where heads of households said they were too busy to complete the questionnaire.

2.1.5. Questionnaire

The questionnaire was based on the Cambodian Socioeconomic Study and adapted to the Myanmar context after discussions with key informants, including UNDP, UNAIDS, WFP, the ILO and local self-help groups (MPG; Positive Women’s Group; Injecting Drug Users Group; female sex worker support group; men who have sex with men support group). Questionnaires were written and administered in the Myanmar language and took about 1-1.5 hours to administer. Questionnaires were paper-based, as surveyors were unfamiliar with electronic forms of data collection.

Pilot testing: The data collection team tested the recruitment process, the questionnaire and surveyors’ ability to administer the survey at an ART clinic (Latha) and the WaiBarGi Infectious Disease Specialist Hospital with the approval of DOH and NAP. The pilot test indicated the need for a revision of the questionnaire layout to facilitate data collection due to its complexity and length (33 pages).

2.1.6. Ethics and Informed Consent

Ethical approval was obtained from the Department of Medical Research (Lower Myanmar) and the Alfred Hospital Human Research Ethics Committee in Melbourne, Australia.

All study participants gave written consent; consent forms were stored separately to questionnaires to avoid any possibility of identification. Names and specific addresses were not recorded on the questionnaire. Instead, a unique identifier linking a specific interview to an individual and date were used and only the study coordinator had access to code. These were used to track interview completion.

Participants received 3000 kyats (~USD3) for transport to and from the interview site. Heads of non-affected households received the same amount.

2.2. Personnel, Data Collection and Data Entry

2.2.1. Data Collection

Study team: Four teams were recruited for data collection each consisting of a supervisor and 4-5 interviewers. Supervisors were experienced research personnel from the Department of Medical Research (DMR) with prior involvement in large surveys. Interviewers were a mix of male (59.5%) and female (40.5%) members of the Myanmar Positive Group (MPG) Network (Myanmar Drug Users Network, the Myanmar Positive Women Network and the MSM Network) with a minimum high school-level education. Some of these data collectors were HIV positive and most had been employed on previous HIV studies for the Burnet Institute.

Three medically trained technical advisors from the Burnet Institute Myanmar with extensive experience in study design and implementation oversaw data collection. A Melbourne-based medical epidemiologist provided additional technical support. See ANNEX D: Role and Responsibility of Team Members.

Staff training: Teams received 5 days training (30/09/14 – 4/10/14) including role-playing and field exercises. Staff were formally tested at the end of training on their knowledge of the questionnaire and their interviewer skills. An additional 2 days of refresher training was undertaken the following week to consolidate learning and go over common gaps in knowledge and practice. See Annex E: Training Agenda for Data Collection Team.

Monitoring of data collection: Supervisors reviewed all interviews for completeness and correctness before interviews were concluded. Logbooks and checklists were developed to standardise supervision. Technical advisors reviewed questionnaires from each team before teams were allowed to move to another site. Teams met daily to discuss challenges, seek advice from the technical advisors and agree on standard approaches. Data entry staff again reviewed paper questionnaires before data were entered into computers.

Data entry: Given the complexity of the questionnaire, interviewers themselves were trained to double-enter data into an Epidata 3.1 (http://www.epidata.dk/). Development of the database was supported by a Melbourne-based data manager expert and consisted of extensive logical checks and skip patterns to facilitate accurate data entry. All data entry was overseen by one of the Myanmar technical advisors who reviewed the duplicate entries and compared errors with the original paper questionnaire.

2.3. DATA ANALYSIS

2.3.1. Categories of Analysis

Analyses were conducted at two levels: the individual level and the household level. For each set of analyses different categories were created for comparison as seen in the table below.

The gender / sector distribution of the individuals by their status is shown below. Proportions were similar for most groups, however, more women than men were living with a chronic disease and more PLCD resided in urban rather than rural areas.

2.3.2. Statistical Analyses

The analysis started with basic cross tabs of background information for households and individuals in order to determine inconsistencies in the relationships between variables. The results for the total population and households, as well as the percentages and means were then checked.

Multiple levels of analysis were performed
The Socio-Economic Impact of People Living with HIV at the Household Level in Myanmar

Chapter 2: Methodology & Data

The principle analyses compared the results of different variables by HIV-HHs (case) and to NA-HHs (comparison). The comparisons between HIV-affected and non-affected were conducted while taking into consideration, at both the individual and household-level, a range of socio-economic factors. The analyses were then divided into different topics, including (at the household level) income, consumption, debt, savings, assets and individual characteristics (e.g. education, marital status, age, sector). A detailed analysis of the head of the household, PLHIV and PLCD, among others, were also conducted.

SPSS and STATA were both used for preparing/programming the variables, recoding, merging and tabulation.
Throughout the report, any result with a resulting statistical significance greater than 0.05 is indicated by the use of an * in the figure or table showing the results.

2.3.3. Quintiles of Socioeconomic Status

To analyse the economic impact of HIV at the household level, a measure of wealth/poverty is required. Income, consumption, expenditure and assets have all been employed as measures. Income is commonly used in developed countries, while consumption and expenditure are considered more reliable in developing countries but require detailed localised item lists and extensive data collection. The asset-based measure is gaining popularity particularly in settings where household income is inconsistent or poorly reported and is recommended in the United Nations’ Handbook on Poverty Statistics: Concepts, Methods and Policy Use (United Nations, 2005). As some households did not report any income, and expenditures sometimes conflicted with household belongings, a household assets index was constructed using methods advised by the UN text. We excluded uncommon possessions (e.g. smartphone, motorised (1%) and non-motorised boats (1%)) and assets that were divided along rural/urban sectors that did help in the construction of a national socio-economic index (e.g. ownership of an oxcart (2%) or farm animals such as buffalos (6%), horses (1%) and pigs (20%). The following categories were included as the raw list of assets to define socio-economic quintiles:

- √ Member per sleeping room
- √ Roof main material
- √ Floor main material
- √ Main source of lighting
- √ Main source of drinking water in dry season
- √ Toilet facility
- √ Type of cooking fuel
- √ Own a radio
- √ Own a TV
- √ Own a basic phone
- √ Own a refrigerator/freezer
- √ Own a computer
- √ Own a bicycle
- √ Own a motorcycle
- √ Own a car
- √ Own land

By using Stata software and Principal Component Analysis (PCA), the variable “Quintile-Asset” was created, as shown in Table 4. As a result, from 2512 households, household asset data were incomplete for only 14 households, which were excluded from analysis (Table 4).

Table 4: Quintiles of Asset-based approach

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Asset Quintile</th>
<th>Number of HH</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1 Lowest / Poorest</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>499</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5 Highest / Wealthiest</td>
<td>499</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>2,498</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

2.3.4. Stage of Infection

PLHIV were stratified by their stage of infection using participants’ reports of their last CD4 count regardless of when this test might have been done. The CDC Classification System for HIV Infection was used to create three categories as follows:

1. Greater or equal to 500 cells/μL
2. Between 200 and 499 cells/μL; and
3. Lower than 200 cells/μL
The sample was restricted to responses with CD4 count below 1900 cells / μL to exclude outliers.

2.4. LIMITATIONS TO THE STUDY

A number of sampling biases need to be considered when interpreting the findings from this study:

- PLHIV who do not know their status or who have not sought care were not part of our sampling frame. There is, however, no practical way to sample these people.

- Small clinics and insecure areas were excluded from our study. While these make up only a small portion of all PLHIV registered at ART clinics, people from these areas and attending these clinics may be different from those included in our sampling frame.

- Four clinics were purposely sampled rather than randomly sampled proportional to population size. However, there was no difference in findings when including or excluding these four clinics.

- Enrolment of PLHIV at clinics was a non-random process but the only ethically sound means of recruitment.

- 1 in 9 women with HIV refused to participate.

- The selection of comparison households was based on proximity to a case household. These comparison households may not represent the source population from which cases originate.

Many questions asked about historical events for which the recall period varied. Recall bias is a possibility and likely to be more of a problem for questions related to longer recall periods and that asked about exact details such as expenses (Table 5). Misreporting of specific expenses and revenue is a possibility, although surveyors had the impression that respondents were not exaggerating or downplaying their economic circumstances.

Chronic medical conditions were as reported by participants and were not confirmed by health workers or health records. Heads of comparison households with residents living with HIV or tuberculosis (exclusion criteria) may not have disclosed this to surveyors particularly given enrolment was at the household and a local midwife accompanied surveyors.

Analysis adjusted for measured variables, however, there may be unmeasured confounders that we have not accounted for and the matching process precludes examination by the location of households.
Table 5: Recall periods for questionnaire topics

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Questionnaire topics</th>
<th>Recall period</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Physical activity</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Food, alcohol and beverage consumption and costs</td>
<td>7 days</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paid work and primary occupation</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Injury or health problem (nature, stopped usual activities, healthcare sought, costs)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Employment (type, earnings etc.)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Household expenses (utilities, rent, interest from debt, medical fees, transportation, etc.)</td>
<td>4 weeks</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Meals eaten per day and food security support received</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quality of life questions</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Missed work / work lost to ill health</td>
<td>3 months</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Non-food expenditure (clothing)</td>
<td>6 months</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child missing school</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hospitalisations (number, cost)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deaths in household</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Revenue (income, remittances, profits from sales, scholarships etc.)</td>
<td>12 months</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Changes in household expenditure as a result of having family member with HIV / NCD</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inadequate food for family</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stigma and discrimination questions</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CHAPTER SUMMARY

- There was no difference in the urban/rural distribution of HIV-HHs and NA-HHs (49.4% for both).
- HIV-HHs were smaller in size on average (3.9 HH members) than NA-HHs (4.8 HH members) as well as the national average of 5 HH members.
- HIV-HHs were more likely to have migrated within the previous 5 years than NA-HHs (34.2% vs. 23.1%).
- There was no significant difference in the gender distribution of the households' members (males represent 46.3% of HIV-HH members and 46.6% of NA-HHs).
- There was no significant difference in the mean age of household members (30.9 years in HIV-HHs versus 31.5 years in NA-HHs).
- A significantly larger proportion of HIV-HHs contained a person living with a chronic disease than NA-HHs (30.7% of HIV-HHs versus 26.4% of NA-HHs).
- HIV-HH Head of Households (HoH) were more likely to be female than in NA-HHs (33.1% versus 25.7%).
- HIV-HH HoHs were more likely to be currently widowed, separated, divorced, or abandoned than those in NA-HHs (30.1% versus 17.0%).
- 38.9% of HoHs in HIV-HHs are either PLHIV or PLCD while PLCD represent only 14.4% of HoHs in NA-HHs.
- A greater proportion of HIV-HHs were in the lowest quintile than in the highest (23% versus 17%) while the reverse proportions was true for NA-HHs.
- There were no significant differences in the distribution of households across quintiles of socio-economic status based on the gender of the head of household for either NA-HHs or HIV-HHs (i.e., male headed households were not more likely to be in the highest SES quintiles than female headed households).
- HIV-HHs were less likely to own their place of residence (64.0%) compared to NA-HHs (79.9%), but ownership within type of household did not vary by the gender of the head of household, nor based on whether a member was living with a chronic disease.
- HIV-HHs were more than twice as likely to pay rent as non-affected households (20.2% versus 8.8%).
HIV-HHs suffer from reduced asset accumulation, and owned less of almost every item than non-affected households

For NA-HHs, the only significant difference in asset ownership between households with a member living with a chronic disease compared to those without was for radios, where those with a PLCD were more likely to own (31.1% of households without a PLCD compared to 38.4% of households with a PLCD owned a radio)

For both HIV-HHs and NA-HHs, male-headed HHs reported owning more basic assets than female-headed HHs

3.1. PROFILE OF SAMPLE HOUSEHOLDS

This section of the report provides a profile of the surveyed households, highlighting the principal socio-economic and demographic differences between case and comparison households. According to national data, there are about 5 people per household (IHLCA, 2011). NA-HHs in our sample were of a similar size (4.8) whereas HIV-HHs were smaller (3.9) (Table 6). This is likely due to the larger proportion of HIV-HHs that were headed by widows and higher levels of household mortality reported. In addition, HIV-HHs are more likely to have migrated in the previous 5 years (34.2% vs. 23.1% for non-affected households), which could have impacted on household size if not all members moved (see Section 9.2).

Case and comparison households had similar proportions of men and women (46.3% male in HIV-HHs; 46.6% male in NA-HHs) and there were only small differences in the age structure of members with HIV-HH households having fewer older residents (Table 6). The ethnic makeup of each group was nearly identical and the education level of household members was similar.

Slightly more HIV-HHs had residents living with a (non-HIV) chronic disease compared with NA-HHs (30.7% vs. 26.4%). Few households (~6%) counted more than one person living with a chronic disease, however, over 30% of HIV-HHs had more than one family member living with HIV.

3.2. PROFILE OF THE HEADS OF HOUSEHOLDS

The economic standing of the HoH is one of the most important indications of the overall economic status of the household. Myanmar has seen an increase in the proportion of female-headed households (21% in 2010; IHLCA, 2011), a phenomenon that is more common in urban (27%) than rural areas (19%). Table 7 details the important differences that were reported between the HoHs of HIV-HHs and NA-HHs in rural and urban locations as well as both locations combined. Overall, for both rural and urban households, heads of HIV-HHs were significantly more likely to be a female than heads of NA-HHs (33.1% vs. 25.7% overall). For HIV-HHs that number is over 10 percentage points higher than the national data indicates. This is likely connected to the higher number of widows and individuals of unmarried status in the HIV-affected
Table 6: Basic Socioeconomic and Demographic Characteristics of Sample Households

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>HIV-HH (n=1,256)</th>
<th>NA-HH (n=1,256)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Mean # of household members / HH</td>
<td>3.9</td>
<td>4.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Location of HH: Urban</td>
<td>49.4</td>
<td>49.4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Household migrated in last 5 years</td>
<td>34.2</td>
<td>23.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HH members (n=4,941)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-HH members (n=5,988)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sex of HH members: Males</td>
<td>46.3</td>
<td>46.6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Age of household members</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&lt;5</td>
<td>6.5</td>
<td>7.6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5-14</td>
<td>19.3</td>
<td>18.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15-24</td>
<td>14.0</td>
<td>17.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25-34</td>
<td>17.3</td>
<td>15.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35-44</td>
<td>20.2</td>
<td>13.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>45-54</td>
<td>10.5</td>
<td>11.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥55</td>
<td>12.2</td>
<td>16.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mean age of household members</td>
<td>30.9 years</td>
<td>31.5 years</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Education level of HH members (≥5 YOA)</td>
<td>%</td>
<td>%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No school</td>
<td>0.7</td>
<td>0.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some primary school</td>
<td>37.8</td>
<td>33.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some secondary school</td>
<td>50.7</td>
<td>52.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>More than secondary school</td>
<td>10.8</td>
<td>13.6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ethnicity of HH members</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Myanmar</td>
<td>72.86</td>
<td>72.14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kachin</td>
<td>10.46</td>
<td>10.6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shan</td>
<td>5.87</td>
<td>5.71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other</td>
<td>10.81</td>
<td>11.55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HIV or CD status of HH members</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td># of PLHIV</td>
<td>1,693</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>% of Households with PLHIV</td>
<td>100%</td>
<td>0%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td># of PLCD (excluding HIV)</td>
<td>483</td>
<td>420</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>% of Households with PLCD</td>
<td>30.7%</td>
<td>26.4%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td># of PLHIV in HIV-HHs:</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 PLHIV</td>
<td>68.1%</td>
<td>n/a</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2 PLHIV</td>
<td>27.2%</td>
<td>n/a</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3 PLHIV</td>
<td>4.5%</td>
<td>n/a</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4 PLHIV</td>
<td>0.2%</td>
<td>n/a</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mean # of PLHIV in HH</td>
<td>1.4</td>
<td>n/a</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td># of PLCD in HHs:</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>0 PLCD</td>
<td>69.3</td>
<td>73.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 PLCD</td>
<td>24.3</td>
<td>20.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2 PLCD</td>
<td>5.3</td>
<td>5.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3 or more PLCD</td>
<td>1.1</td>
<td>1.0</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

* YOA - Years of Age households. Additionally, as with national data, urban households were more likely to be headed by a female than rural households, for both HIV-HHs and NA-HHs.

Heads of HIV-HHs were more likely to be under the age of 55, reflecting the impact of HIV on the family structure. Additionally, they were significantly less likely to be married, and more likely to be widowed (overall, 23.0% of all heads of HIV-HHs were widowed vs. 14.2% of heads of NA-HHs). While there were almost no differences with regard to educational status between HIV-HHs and NA-HHs, there were differences overall by urban and rural locations (almost twice as many HoHs in urban households had more than secondary school than those in rural areas).

There was only a very small difference in the percentage of HIV positive heads of households in rural and urban locations, with 31.3% of surveyed urban HIV-HHs being led by a PLHIV compared to only 29.4% in rural areas (overall, 30.3% of HIV-HH HoHs were HIV positive). There was a difference in the percentage of HoH living with a chronic disease in rural and urban locations, with 16.8% of surveyed urban non-affected households being led by a

Table 7: Basic Characteristics of Heads of Households, by location

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Urban</th>
<th>Rural</th>
<th>All</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HH (n=620)</td>
<td>NA-HH (n=620)</td>
<td>HIV-HH (n=636)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>%</td>
<td>%</td>
<td>%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sex of HoH</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Male</td>
<td>65.5</td>
<td>73.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Female</td>
<td>34.5</td>
<td>26.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Age of HoH</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≤24</td>
<td>1.4</td>
<td>0.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25-34</td>
<td>20.6</td>
<td>13.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35-44</td>
<td>39.3</td>
<td>22.6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>45-54</td>
<td>20.3</td>
<td>22.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥55</td>
<td>18.4</td>
<td>40.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mean Age of HoH</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43.6</td>
<td>50.4</td>
<td>43.4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Current Marital Status of HoH</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Never married</td>
<td>6.4</td>
<td>4.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Currently Married</td>
<td>63.0</td>
<td>79.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Separated /Divorced /Abandoned</td>
<td>7.4</td>
<td>2.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Currently Widowed</td>
<td>23.2</td>
<td>13.9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Education Level of HoH (≥5 YOA)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No school</td>
<td>3.4</td>
<td>3.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some primary school</td>
<td>27.3</td>
<td>27.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some secondary school</td>
<td>54.9</td>
<td>55.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>More than secondary school</td>
<td>13.4</td>
<td>14.0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Status</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PLHIV</td>
<td>31.3</td>
<td>n/a</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PLCD</td>
<td>n/a</td>
<td>16.8</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
PLCD compared to 12.2% in rural areas (overall, 14.4% of NA-HH HoHs were living with a chronic condition).

3.3. ECONOMIC STATUS OF THE SAMPLE HOUSEHOLDS

In this section, a general picture is presented of the economic status of the sampled households. As outlined in Section 2.3.3, a wealth index was created for households, based on their asset levels. Figure 10 shows the distribution of households by the quintiles of wealth (see Section 2.3.3). As expected, both case and comparison households were fairly evenly distributed among the quintiles, although a significantly greater proportion of HIV-HHs were in the lowest quintile than in the highest (23% versus 17%); these proportions were reversed for NA-HHs. There were no statistical differences in wealth between male and female-headed HHs either for HIV-HHs or NA-HHs (Figure 11), though rural HHs were significantly poorer than urban HHs (Figure 12) consistent with the general economic situation in Myanmar.

The basic amenities of a household, and asset accumulation are often used as indicators of economic status (Table 8 and Figure 13 through Figure 17). HIV-HHs and NA-HHs reported the same number of rooms for sleeping per member (1.6), as did female and male HoHs for both groups. Furthermore, the average number of rooms available for sleeping per member was the same for households with female HoHs and male HoHs, both in HIV-HHs and NA-HHs. HIV-HHs were less likely to have electricity as the main source of home lighting (72.0% vs. 79.9%) and less likely to have a flush toilet (84.1% vs. 88.0%).
For HIV-HH, more male than female HoHs used public electricity (70.2% vs. 66.3%) whereas the opposite was true for NA-HHs (76.8% vs. 80.8%). More male-headed households had a flush toilet regardless of the group. Urban households had greater access to these amenities than their rural counterparts.

A critical component of economic security is ownership of the household’s dwelling. There were important differences in household ownership\(^{10}\) shown by the survey, reflecting the underlying impacts of HIV on reduced asset accumulation and sale of assets. As shown in Figure 13, significantly less HIV-HHs owned their dwelling than NA-HHs (64.0% versus 79.9%; Figure 13) with differences more pronounced in urban areas. However, dwelling ownership was greater in rural rather than urban areas. There were no significant differences in dwelling ownership based on the gender of the head of the household for HIV-HHs or for NA-HHs. Figure 14 shows that female-headed NA-HHs were the most likely to report owning their house (82.7%) and male-headed HIV-HHs were the least likely

\(^{10}\) Either the family reported owning the dwelling or being in a shared-ownership arrangement

---

Table 8: Distribution of Households by the Status of Basic Amenities

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Urban (n=620)</th>
<th>Rural (n=620)</th>
<th>All (n=1,256)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td># rooms used for sleeping</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>1.6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>%</td>
<td>%</td>
<td>%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Type of Flooring</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Earth / Clay</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>69</td>
<td>67</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wooden Planks</td>
<td>49.0</td>
<td>47.3</td>
<td>48.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bamboo Strips</td>
<td>11.5</td>
<td>21.1</td>
<td>16.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cement / Brick / Stone</td>
<td>27.0</td>
<td>18.7</td>
<td>22.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other</td>
<td>6.0</td>
<td>5.9</td>
<td>6.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Primary fuel for cooking</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Firewood</td>
<td>24.0</td>
<td>48.4</td>
<td>36.4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Charcoal</td>
<td>32.1</td>
<td>23.7</td>
<td>27.9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liquefied Petroleum Gas</td>
<td>0.6</td>
<td>0.3</td>
<td>0.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>City power</td>
<td>41.1</td>
<td>25.5</td>
<td>33.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other</td>
<td>2.2</td>
<td>2.1</td>
<td>2.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Electricity main source of lighting</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sanitation: Flush toilet</td>
<td>88.7</td>
<td>86.5</td>
<td>84.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Assets</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Motorcycle</td>
<td>49.4</td>
<td>44.4</td>
<td>47.0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Radio</td>
<td>33.5</td>
<td>35.4</td>
<td>34.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Television</td>
<td>74.2</td>
<td>64.3</td>
<td>69.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Smartphone</td>
<td>52.1</td>
<td>40.1</td>
<td>46.0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fridge</td>
<td>25.2</td>
<td>13.4</td>
<td>19.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>%</td>
<td>%</td>
<td>%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

\(^{10}\) Either the family reported owning the dwelling or being in a shared-ownership arrangement
Figure 13: Percentage of Households that Own Dwelling, by location

!Graph showing percentage of households that own their dwelling by location.

Figure 14: Percentage of Households that Own Dwelling, by Gender of HoH

!Graph showing percentage of households that own their dwelling by gender of head of household.

Figure 15: Distribution of Households by Asset Ownership: Percentage of Households that Own a Land Plot

!Graph showing distribution of households by asset ownership.
Chapter 3: Profile of Sample Households and PLHIV

Figure 16: Distribution of Household Asset Ownership

Figure 17: Distribution of Asset Ownership for NA-HHs, by chronic disease status
(63.7%), although there were no differences in ownership by gender of the head of the household within each group. Differences in dwelling ownership between HIV-HHs and NA-HHs were consistent over location of residence, though more pronounced in the urban regions.

HIV-HHs were also significantly less likely to own a plot of land than NA-HHs (49.4% vs. 64.9%) and the average size of the plot owned was smaller (2962 sq. ft. vs. 3237 sq. ft). In addition, HIV-HHs were more than twice as likely to pay rent as NA-HHs (20.2% versus 8.8%), and the gender of HoH had little effect on the likelihood if the residence was rented. For both household types, a substantially greater proportion of rural households owned their place of residence than those in urban areas.

With two exceptions (pigs and radios), HIV-affected households had comparably fewer basic assets than NA-HHs including televisions (69.2% vs. 80.7%), bicycles (43.7% HIV-HH vs. 53.7%), and telephones (46.0% vs. 56.8%). These differences have important implications for mobility, food security, employment and educational opportunities, and may trap HIV-HHs in a cycle of poverty. In contrast, there was almost no difference in asset ownership between NA-HHs with and without a member living with a chronic disease (Figure 17). As expected, ownership of many assets increased by quintile of wealth in HIV-HHs (televisions: 26.5% vs. 99.5%; refrigerators: 0.0% vs. 69.3%; smartphones: 17.5% vs. 77.4%; computers: 1.0% vs. 17.9%). A similar pattern was seen with NA-HHs. Some assets showed a negative correlation between wealth and ownership in HIV-HHs including pigs (37.8% Q1 vs. 6.6% Q5), and buffalo/cows (7.9% vs. 1.4%).

When disaggregated by gender of the HoH, male-headed HHHs own more basic household items than female-headed HHs in both HIV-HHs and NA-HHs particularly for smartphones (49.0% of MH-HIV-HH vs. 39.9% of FH-HIV-HH; 58.5% of MH-NA-HH vs. 52.0% of FH-NA-HH) and bicycles (46.4% of MH-HIV-HH vs. 38.5% of FH-HIV-HH; 54.7% of MH-NA-HH vs. 54.5% of FH-NA-HH).

3.4. PROFILE OF INTERVIEWED PLHIV AND PLCD

3.4.1. PLHIV Interviewees

Table 9 shows that slightly more male than female PLHIV-INT (47.2% vs. 52.8%) were interviewed. There were substantial differences in marital status, with women more likely to have been widowed (34.1% vs. 8.6%) and less likely to be currently married (52.6% vs. 59.8%). Men had attained a higher level of education than women and urban PLHIV-INT had more education than those living in rural areas. Female PLHIV-INT reported higher levels of unemployment than males (32.5% vs. 25.4%).

Table 10 displays the characteristics of the PLHIV-INT across the quintiles of socio-economic status. There was little difference between the lowest and highest quintiles with regards to age, but there were significant differences in socio-economic status by marital status (widows composed a greater proportion of the lowest SES quintile (24%) than the highest (17%)), which may reflect differences in gender across quintiles (more males were in the highest
Chapter 3: Profile of Sample Households and PLHIV

Table 9: Characteristics of Interviewed PLHIV, by location

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Age</th>
<th>Urban HHs</th>
<th>Rural HHs</th>
<th>Total HHs</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Male</td>
<td>Female</td>
<td>Male</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>(n=298)</td>
<td>(n=325)</td>
<td>(n=294)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>0-14</td>
<td>0.0 %</td>
<td>0.0 %</td>
<td>0.0 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15-24</td>
<td>1.0 %</td>
<td>6.5 %</td>
<td>5.1 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25-54</td>
<td>92.6 %</td>
<td>88.6 %</td>
<td>86.4 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥55</td>
<td>6.4 %</td>
<td>4.9 %</td>
<td>8.5 %</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Marital Status (≥14 YOA)</th>
<th>Urban HHs</th>
<th>Rural HHs</th>
<th>Total HHs</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Currently Married</td>
<td>60.4 %</td>
<td>52.9 %</td>
<td>56.5 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Separated / Divorced / Abandoned</td>
<td>7.4 %</td>
<td>12.3 %</td>
<td>8.5 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Widowed</td>
<td>9.4 %</td>
<td>32.3 %</td>
<td>7.8 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Never married</td>
<td>22.8 %</td>
<td>2.2 %</td>
<td>24.5 %</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Educational status</th>
<th>Urban HHs</th>
<th>Rural HHs</th>
<th>Total HHs</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>No school</td>
<td>2.0 %</td>
<td>4.0 %</td>
<td>4.3 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Some primary school</td>
<td>21.4 %</td>
<td>33.3 %</td>
<td>30.1 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Some secondary school or more</td>
<td>75.6 %</td>
<td>62.3 %</td>
<td>65.6 %</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Employment Status (15-64 YOA)</th>
<th>Urban HHs</th>
<th>Rural HHs</th>
<th>Total HHs</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Unemployed &gt;= 15 YOA</td>
<td>25.0 %</td>
<td>33.3 %</td>
<td>25.7 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Working more than one job</td>
<td>3.7 %</td>
<td>4.9 %</td>
<td>4.8 %</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 10: Characteristics of Interviewed PLHIV, by quintile of socio-economic status

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Quintile</th>
<th>Lowest (n=291)</th>
<th>Q2 (n=252)</th>
<th>Q3 (n=251)</th>
<th>Q4 (n=247)</th>
<th>Highest (n=212)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Sex</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Male</td>
<td>38.8 %</td>
<td>44.8 %</td>
<td>44.2 %</td>
<td>55.3 %</td>
<td>55.7 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Female</td>
<td>61.2 %</td>
<td>55.2 %</td>
<td>55.8 %</td>
<td>44.7 %</td>
<td>44.3 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Age</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>0-14</td>
<td>0.0 %</td>
<td>0.0 %</td>
<td>0.0 %</td>
<td>0.0 %</td>
<td>0.0 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15-24</td>
<td>6.2 %</td>
<td>6.3 %</td>
<td>2.4 %</td>
<td>5.7 %</td>
<td>3.3 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25-54</td>
<td>88.6 %</td>
<td>87.7 %</td>
<td>90.0 %</td>
<td>88.2 %</td>
<td>89.6 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥55</td>
<td>5.2 %</td>
<td>6.0 %</td>
<td>7.6 %</td>
<td>6.1 %</td>
<td>7.1 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marital Status (≥15YOA)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Currently Married</td>
<td>57.8 %</td>
<td>55.6 %</td>
<td>57.0 %</td>
<td>55.3 %</td>
<td>53.8 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Separated / Divorced / Abandoned</td>
<td>10.7 %</td>
<td>8.3 %</td>
<td>8.0 %</td>
<td>8.9 %</td>
<td>8.0 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Widowed</td>
<td>24.1 %</td>
<td>23.8 %</td>
<td>24.7 %</td>
<td>19.5 %</td>
<td>17.5 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Never married</td>
<td>7.6 %</td>
<td>12.3 %</td>
<td>10.4 %</td>
<td>16.3 %</td>
<td>20.8 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Educational status</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No school</td>
<td>6.5 %</td>
<td>6.0 %</td>
<td>3.3 %</td>
<td>3.3 %</td>
<td>2.4 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some primary school</td>
<td>50.6 %</td>
<td>38.8 %</td>
<td>30.5 %</td>
<td>19.0 %</td>
<td>11.7 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Some secondary school or higher</td>
<td>42.9 %</td>
<td>54.7 %</td>
<td>65.7 %</td>
<td>77.7 %</td>
<td>84.9 %</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Employment Status (15-64 YOA)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Working more than one job</td>
<td>7.3 %</td>
<td>5.5 %</td>
<td>1.4 %</td>
<td>4.1 %</td>
<td>4.2 %</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Figure 18: Mode of Determining HIV Status, by location

- Urban: 45.7% (TB clinic), 11.0% (Blood testing), 33.2% (Voluntary Testing)
- Rural: 44.0% (Blood testing), 39.3% (Voluntary Testing)
- Total: 44.8% (Blood testing), 36.3% (Voluntary Testing)

Figure 19: Mode of Determining HIV Status, by quintile

- Quintile 1: 42.6% (TB clinic), 36.1% (Blood testing), 38.8% (Voluntary Testing)
- Quintile 2: 39.7% (Blood testing), 38.3% (Voluntary Testing)
- Quintile 3: 42.6% (Blood testing), 34.0% (Voluntary Testing)
- Quintile 4: 50.2% (Blood testing), 33.5% (Voluntary Testing)
- Quintile 5: 49.5% (Blood testing), 33.5% (Voluntary Testing)
Figure 20: Mode of Determining HIV Status, by States / Regions

Figure 21: Mode of HIV Transmission, by sex
Differences in educational status and employment status were clear: almost twice the proportion of PLHIV-INT in Quintile 5 had attained some secondary school education or higher than those in the lowest quintile. They also reported lower unemployment rates and were less likely to report working more than one job.

Figure 18 highlights how the status of the interviewed PLHIV was determined. Those living in urban households were more likely than those in rural areas to have been diagnosed with HIV through VCCT (Figure 18), as well as being less likely to have been diagnosed after a prolonged illness. This may be related to disparities in the quality of HIV-educational programs including peer-support networks and outreach services or access to testing services in urban compared to rural areas.

Similarly, there is an inverse correlation between household wealth and the likelihood of determining status following a prolonged illness (36.1% Q2 to 33.5% Q5) and a positive correlation between households’ wealth and HIV diagnosis through VCCT (39.7% Q2 to 49.5% Q5) as shown in Figure 19. This may be due to better access (more poor households are located in rural areas with fewer facilities and greater distances between) or higher levels of awareness regarding the need for testing among wealthier households.
Figure 23: Years Since Diagnosis, by location

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Location</th>
<th>0-1 years</th>
<th>1-5 years</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Urban</td>
<td>16.2%</td>
<td>60.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rural</td>
<td>21.1%</td>
<td>63.8%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>18.7%</td>
<td>62.1%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Figure 24: Years Since Diagnosis, by quintile

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Quintile</th>
<th>0-1 years</th>
<th>1-5 years</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 1</td>
<td>21.1%</td>
<td>68.0%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 2</td>
<td>20.0%</td>
<td>65.1%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 3</td>
<td>15.4%</td>
<td>58.9%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 4</td>
<td>20.9%</td>
<td>63.4%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 5</td>
<td>15.6%</td>
<td>53.7%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
There were no statistically significant differences in the proportion of PLHIV diagnosed through voluntary testing compared to those diagnosed after a prolonged illness by province, however, sample sizes were small (Figure 20). The patterns do point to parts of the country where PLHIV may be being diagnosed at a later stage, suggesting a need for improvements in the access and utilisation of VCCT. For instance, more than 50% of PLHIV in Tanintharyi were diagnosed after a prolonged illness.

Most HIV was reported to have been acquired through heterosexual sexual contact (41.9% men, 69.4% women) and needle sharing (overall 9.7%) (Figure 21). Almost 66% of respondents who said that their transmission was through sex said that their spouse or long-term partner was the source of the infection. Despite recruitment of PLHIV from ART clinics, other modes of transmission may have been underestimated given that the follow-up interviews were only in households and individuals in brothels, rehabilitation facilities and the homeless are not captured. As a result, the number of transmissions through “other” forms will be under-represented in comparison to the overall situation in Myanmar. The results may also partially reflect a bias on the part of survey respondents to not share sensitive information about sexual preferences or drug use.

Figure 22 shows how PLHIV responded differently regarding how they received their HIV infection, across wealth quintiles. The wealthiest PLHIV (Q5) were over eight times more likely than those in the poorest economic band (Q1) to have contracted HIV from homosexual sex (Figure 22). There were no differences across wealth quintiles for the few participants who contracted HIV via mother to child transmission (MTCT), which was under 1%. This study, however, excluded children and adolescents. National data from 2009 claim that 0.96% of pregnant women were living with HIV, of which 22% transmitted HIV to the child (Myanmar Ministry of Health, 2011).

Two hundred and twenty-three participants (18.7%) said that they had been diagnosed within the last year, and 741 (62.1%) within the last 5 years (Figure 23). Fewer rural PLHIV were diagnosed over 5 years earlier than urban PLHIV (15.1% vs. 23.5%) and fewer poorer participants (Q1) were diagnosed over 5 years ago compared to richer participants (Q5). These patterns may reflect historically better access to treatment for the wealthy and urban dwellers, as well as recent increases in availability of testing (and treatment) across the country (Figure 24).

The proportion of PLHIV in various stages of infection defined by CD4 counts was broadly similar across urban and rural strata (Figure 25) and across quintiles of wealth (Figure 26).

In NA-HHs, 420 household members were identified as having a chronic disease. Of these, 262 were interviewed in detail about their experiences living with the disease. Women made up a significantly larger percentage of PLCD-INT than men (62.9% vs. 37.1%), were more likely to have been widowed (26.5% vs. 6.8%), and less likely to be currently married (60.0% vs. 79.1%) (Table...
Chapter 3: Profile of Sample Households and PLHIV

Figure 25: Stage of Infection, by location

Figure 26: Stage of Infection, by quintile
As with PLHIV, male PLCD-INT attained a higher level of education than females (55.1% had attained some secondary education vs. 44.8%) and urban PLCD-INT had higher levels of education than those in rural areas.

The age distribution of PLCD-INT was similar across quintiles (Table 12), however, there were more widowers and widows in Q1 compared to Q5 (men: 14.8% in Q1 vs. 2.3% in Q5; women: 29.4% in Q1 vs. 21.8% in Q5). In addition, those in Q5 were more likely to be never married compared to those in Q1 (15.3% vs. 4.9%). Unsurprisingly, those PLCD-INT in Quintile 5 had higher levels of education than those in the lowest quintiles. There were only small differences in levels of unemployment across quintiles, with male unemployment slightly decreasing as wealth increased and female unemployment slightly increasing.
Table 12: Characteristics of PLCD, by quintile of socio-economic status

Males

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Age</th>
<th>Lowest (n=18)</th>
<th>Q2 (n=14)</th>
<th>Q3 (n=19)</th>
<th>Q4 (n=15)</th>
<th>Highest (n=25)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>&lt;5</td>
<td>3.4%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>6.1%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5-14</td>
<td>3.4%</td>
<td>3.8%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>8.5%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15-24</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>3.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>4.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25-34</td>
<td>10.3%</td>
<td>15.4%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>4.5%</td>
<td>8.5%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35-44</td>
<td>10.3%</td>
<td>3.8%</td>
<td>9.1%</td>
<td>13.6%</td>
<td>14.9%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44-54</td>
<td>20.7%</td>
<td>23.1%</td>
<td>15.2%</td>
<td>18.2%</td>
<td>19.1%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥55</td>
<td>51.7%</td>
<td>53.8%</td>
<td>66.7%</td>
<td>63.6%</td>
<td>44.7%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Marital Status (≥14YOA)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Marital Status</th>
<th>Lowest (n=18)</th>
<th>Q2 (n=14)</th>
<th>Q3 (n=19)</th>
<th>Q4 (n=15)</th>
<th>Highest (n=25)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Currently Married</td>
<td>77.8%</td>
<td>96.0%</td>
<td>74.2%</td>
<td>77.3%</td>
<td>74.4%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Separated / Divorced / Abandoned</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>3.2%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>2.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Widowed</td>
<td>14.8%</td>
<td>4.0%</td>
<td>6.5%</td>
<td>9.1%</td>
<td>2.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Never married</td>
<td>7.4%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>16.1%</td>
<td>13.6%</td>
<td>20.9%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Educational status (≥5YOA)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Educational status</th>
<th>Lowest (n=18)</th>
<th>Q2 (n=14)</th>
<th>Q3 (n=19)</th>
<th>Q4 (n=15)</th>
<th>Highest (n=25)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>No school</td>
<td>4.0%</td>
<td>8.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>2.2%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some primary school</td>
<td>36.0%</td>
<td>44.0%</td>
<td>23.3%</td>
<td>28.6%</td>
<td>15.2%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some secondary school</td>
<td>60.0%</td>
<td>40.0%</td>
<td>60.0%</td>
<td>47.6%</td>
<td>60.9%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>More than secondary school</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>4.0%</td>
<td>16.7%</td>
<td>23.8%</td>
<td>21.7%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Don't know</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>4.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Females

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Age</th>
<th>Lowest (n=20)</th>
<th>Q2 (n=36)</th>
<th>Q3 (n=33)</th>
<th>Q4 (n=47)</th>
<th>Highest (n=34)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>&lt;5</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>2.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5-14</td>
<td>2.9%</td>
<td>2.0%</td>
<td>1.8%</td>
<td>1.5%</td>
<td>1.8%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15-24</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>5.4%</td>
<td>1.5%</td>
<td>3.6%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25-34</td>
<td>8.6%</td>
<td>8.0%</td>
<td>8.9%</td>
<td>6.1%</td>
<td>3.6%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35-44</td>
<td>11.4%</td>
<td>14.0%</td>
<td>12.5%</td>
<td>13.6%</td>
<td>19.6%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44-54</td>
<td>28.6%</td>
<td>26.0%</td>
<td>25.0%</td>
<td>19.7%</td>
<td>17.9%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥55</td>
<td>48.6%</td>
<td>48.0%</td>
<td>46.4%</td>
<td>57.6%</td>
<td>53.6%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Marital Status (≥14YOA)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Marital Status</th>
<th>Lowest (n=20)</th>
<th>Q2 (n=36)</th>
<th>Q3 (n=33)</th>
<th>Q4 (n=47)</th>
<th>Highest (n=34)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Currently Married</td>
<td>58.8%</td>
<td>58.3%</td>
<td>60.0%</td>
<td>61.5%</td>
<td>60.0%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Separated / Divorced / Abandoned</td>
<td>8.8%</td>
<td>4.2%</td>
<td>5.5%</td>
<td>4.6%</td>
<td>7.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Widowed</td>
<td>29.4%</td>
<td>33.3%</td>
<td>21.8%</td>
<td>27.7%</td>
<td>21.8%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Never married</td>
<td>2.9%</td>
<td>4.2%</td>
<td>12.7%</td>
<td>6.2%</td>
<td>10.9%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Table 12: Characteristics of PLCD, by quintile of socio-economic status (continued)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Educational status (≥5YOA)</th>
<th>Females</th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Lowest (n=20)</td>
<td>Q2 (n=36)</td>
<td>Q3 (n=33)</td>
<td>Q4 (n=47)</td>
<td>Highest (n=34)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No school</td>
<td>14.3%</td>
<td>6.8%</td>
<td>7.8%</td>
<td>1.6%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some primary school</td>
<td>50.0%</td>
<td>50.0%</td>
<td>56.9%</td>
<td>33.9%</td>
<td>21.6%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some secondary school</td>
<td>35.7%</td>
<td>43.2%</td>
<td>23.5%</td>
<td>58.1%</td>
<td>56.9%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>More than secondary school</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>11.8%</td>
<td>6.5%</td>
<td>21.6%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Don't know</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Age</th>
<th>Females</th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Lowest (n=38)</td>
<td>Q2 (n=50)</td>
<td>Q3 (n=33)</td>
<td>Q4 (n=47)</td>
<td>Highest (n=34)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&lt;5</td>
<td>1.6%</td>
<td>1.3%</td>
<td>2.2%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5-14</td>
<td>3.1%</td>
<td>2.6%</td>
<td>1.1%</td>
<td>1.1%</td>
<td>4.9%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15-24</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>4.5%</td>
<td>1.1%</td>
<td>3.9%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25-34</td>
<td>9.4%</td>
<td>10.5%</td>
<td>5.6%</td>
<td>5.7%</td>
<td>5.8%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35-44</td>
<td>10.9%</td>
<td>10.5%</td>
<td>11.2%</td>
<td>13.6%</td>
<td>17.5%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44-54</td>
<td>25.0%</td>
<td>25.0%</td>
<td>21.3%</td>
<td>19.3%</td>
<td>18.4%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥55</td>
<td>50.0%</td>
<td>50.0%</td>
<td>53.9%</td>
<td>59.1%</td>
<td>49.5%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Marital Status (≥14YOA)</th>
<th>Females</th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Currently Married</td>
<td>67.2%</td>
<td>71.2%</td>
<td>65.1%</td>
<td>65.5%</td>
<td>66.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Separated / Divorced / Abandoned</td>
<td>4.9%</td>
<td>2.7%</td>
<td>4.7%</td>
<td>3.4%</td>
<td>5.1%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Widowed</td>
<td>23.0%</td>
<td>23.3%</td>
<td>16.3%</td>
<td>23.0%</td>
<td>13.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Never married</td>
<td>4.9%</td>
<td>2.7%</td>
<td>14.0%</td>
<td>8.0%</td>
<td>15.3%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Educational status (≥5YOA)</th>
<th>Females</th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Lowest (n=20)</td>
<td>Q2 (n=36)</td>
<td>Q3 (n=33)</td>
<td>Q4 (n=47)</td>
<td>Highest (n=34)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No school</td>
<td>9.4%</td>
<td>7.2%</td>
<td>4.9%</td>
<td>1.2%</td>
<td>1.0%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some primary school</td>
<td>43.4%</td>
<td>47.8%</td>
<td>44.4%</td>
<td>32.5%</td>
<td>18.6%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At least some secondary school</td>
<td>47.2%</td>
<td>42.0%</td>
<td>37.0%</td>
<td>55.4%</td>
<td>58.8%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>More than secondary school</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>1.4%</td>
<td>13.6%</td>
<td>10.8%</td>
<td>21.6%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Don't know</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>1.4%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
<td>0.0%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CHAPTER 4
IMPACT OF HIV ON ECONOMIC FACTORS

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- No differences in unemployment between PLHIV and PLCD, but significantly greater for both groups than for PLNODX.
- PLHIV were significantly more likely than PLCD and PLNODX to report having missed a day of work.
- PLHIV and PLCD were both more likely to report being sick than PLNODX.
- Average per capita income in HIV-HHs was lower than in NA-HHs.
- More PLHIV needed care (14.3%) than were receiving it (7.9%).
- The majority of caregivers (77.0%) for PLHIV were unpaid household members.
- HIV-HHs faced more deaths than NA-HHs.
- HIV-HHs consumed slightly less overall than their NA counterparts; however, they had higher per capita medical care consumption than NA-HHs.
- 56.5% of HIV-HHs reported they had reduced consumption due to HIV, with the main reductions occurring for food consumption.
- Over 20% of HIV-HHs and NACD-HHs indicated they reduced their savings to finance the costs associated with their illness.
- HIV-HHs were more likely to be in debt compared to NA-HHs (32.6% vs. 23.6%).
- HIV-HHs were more likely to report paying higher monthly interest rates (10.3%) than NA-HHs (8.8%).

In this section, specific differences between the economic circumstances of HIV-HHs and NA-HHs are explored in detail. In addition, the economic impacts of HIV and chronic diseases are compared.

4.1. EMPLOYMENT AND PRODUCTIVITY FOR PLHIV AND PLCD

As shown below in Figure 27 PLCD were significantly more likely to be unemployed (of household members between the ages of 15 and 64) than PLHIV and PLNODX (34.6%, 27.3% and 13.7%).

There were no significant differences by location but for PLNODX, women were significantly more likely to be unemployed than men (no differences between genders for PLCD or PLHIV).

However, for those members who reported they were employed, PLHIV were the most likely to report having missed a day of work in the last three months (41.0%) compared
When further asked the reason for their work absence, PLCD and PLHIV were both significantly more likely than PLNODX to indicate that they had missed work due to sickness, but not significantly different than to 33.2% of PLCD and PLNODX (23.8%) (Figure 29). There were no significant differences within each grouping by gender, nor by rural / urban location, although significant differences remained between PLHIV, PLCD and PLNODX for each subgroup.
4.2. HIV AND CHRONIC DISEASES

Impacts on the Need for Care-Giving

PLHIV and PLCD were interviewed to determine their needs for caregiving as for both PLHIV in the later stages of infection, and individuals living with certain chronic diseases who needed assistance with personal, medical, and household related activities. The need for additional care-giving in the home environment can be an economic strain on households in a multitude of ways: household members may need to reduce work hours or time in educational institutions in order to provide care for a sick member, households may migrate to be closer to other family members who can assist in care provision, or households may pay out directly for care, reducing their household’s available resources. Additionally, if the household is unable to take on those additional burdens, it may mean the sick individual’s health status or productivity is lowered.

Figure 31 shows that PLCD were significantly more likely to report the need of a caregiver (22.6% of PLCD versus 14.3% of PLHIV). There were no significant differences in the proportion of individuals requiring a caregiver between rural and urban locations.

However, out of those reporting they needed a caregiver, PLHIV were significantly less likely to report they actually received the attention they required (only 55.3% of PLHIV requiring care-giving assistance received it within the last three months compared to 78.0% of PLCD). Again, there were no significant differences between urban sand rural households.

Figure 33 provides the profile of the caregivers in the surveyed households. There were significant differences between the caregivers in HIV-HHs and NA-HHs: PLHIV were significantly more likely than PLCD to have a caregiver who is not present in the household. This may partially explain the reasons that PLCD were more likely to report that if they required a caregiver, they had received such assistance in the previous three months. The household-based caregivers of both PLHIV and PLCD were significantly more likely to be female than male (77% and 84% respectively). Twice as many household-based PLHIV caregivers reported they had lost income in order to take on caregiving duties compared to those providing care to PLCD (18% versus...
9%) but due to small numbers, that difference was not statistically significant.

4.3. IMPACT OF HIV ON MORTALITY AND INCOME

The death of a household member can have a severe impact on a household – from emotional and psychological impacts to economic suffering through the loss of an income earner. Figure 35 highlights that, while all household groups were forced to face the consequences of losing a household member in the preceding 12 months, a greater proportion of HIV-HHs reported a death compared to NA-HH without a member with a chronic disease (5.7% vs. 3.3%; Figure 34). There was no significant difference between HIV-HHs and NA-CD-HHs, or between NA-CD-HHs and NA-HH-NoCDs.

Decedents in HIV-HHs were younger than those in other households, but it was not significantly different (49.2 years of age in HIV-HHs 50.9 in NA-HH-NoCDs and 60.2 in NA-CD-HHs) and more HIV-HHs lost an income-earning family member (47.4% vs. 39.6% in NA-HHs; Figure 35), but again the difference was not significant. However, the average income of the deceased member was significantly greater in NA-HHs (167,800MMK/US$150.15 vs. 80,300MMK/US$71.85), likely related to their older age of death.

4.4. IMPACT OF HIV ON HOUSEHOLD REVENUES

In Myanmar, a large share of household revenue is derived from non-wage income (20.0% for HIV-HH; 23.7% for NA-HH).

4.4.1. Total Household Revenues

Average per capita household income for HIV-HHs (858,624MMK or US$768) was substantially lower than for NA-HH (901,564MMK or US$807) with NA-HHs deriving more income from a diverse range of sources (trade/business/petty shops and sale of land or buildings) (Figure 36). Salaries are the most important economic resource for all households but slightly more important for HIV-HHs than NA-HHs (79.3% of all income vs. 74.9%).

As expected, revenues from agricultural activities are more important for rural households than urban households while income from trade/business/petty shops is higher for urban households (Figure 37). National data shows that Urban involvement in agriculture, hunting and forestry is only 7.1%,
Figure 37a: Source of Total Household Revenues, by location

Figure 37b: Source of Total Household Revenues, by location
while rural involvement reaches 63.8%.\footnote{IHLCA Project Technical Unit, Ministry of National Planning and Economic Development, UNDP, Integrated Household Living Conditions Survey in Myanmar (2009-2010), June 2011, Pg. 38} Agricultural related activities in Myanmar are also more important for poor household members (54% involvement in agricultural activities) than non-poor household members (49% involvement).\footnote{IHLCA Project Technical Unit, Ministry of National Planning and Economic Development, UNDP, Integrated Household Living Conditions Survey in Myanmar (2009-2010), June 2011, Pg. 37} In the survey, revenues from government poverty reduction incentives (<0.1% of for both urban and rural) and interest/dividends (0.2% of household revenues for urban and <0.1% rural) constitute only a small proportion of total household revenues.

Income from both agriculture and trade were higher for NA-HHs than HIV-HHs. In contrast, HIV-HHs received more for student scholarships and assistance programs (776MMK (US$0.69) vs. 4,454MMK (US$3.99)). This suggests that assistance programs targeting HIV households are reaching their intended recipients. Surprisingly, the revenue received from the sale of land or buildings was no higher for HIV-HHs than NA-HHs, so sales of major assets do not appear to be significant coping mechanisms for HIV-HHs to alleviate economic stress.

Figure 38 shows similar findings across socio-economic quintiles. The importance of agricultural activities decreased with increasing wealth for NA-HHs (Q1 8%; Q5 <1%) and HIV-HHs (Q1 5%; Q5 <1%). For all quintiles, agriculture accounted for a greater percentage of NA-HH revenues than HIV-HH revenues.

\begin{figure}
\centering
\includegraphics[width=\textwidth]{figure38.png}
\caption{Source of Total Household Revenues, by quintile} \end{figure}
Chapter 4: Impact of HIV on Economic Factors

Figure 39: Source of Per Capita Income, by location (000s)

- Other
- Remittances
- Trade/Business etc
- Salaries
- Sale of land or buildings
- Agriculture & Related Activities

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Location</th>
<th>Source of Per Capita Income (000s)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Urban</td>
<td>HIV-HH</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>NA-HH</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rural</td>
<td>HIV-HH</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>NA-HH</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Figure 40: Source of Per Capita Income by Location in Percentage

- Sale of land or buildings
- Trade/Business/Petty Shops etc
- Agriculture and Related Activities
- Salaries
- Remittances from relatives or others
Figure 41: Per Capita Annual Revenue, Gender (000s)

Figure 42: Source of Per Capita Income, by quintile
4.4.2. Impact of HIV on per Capita Income

As with total household revenue, salaries are the most important source of per capita income followed by trade/business/petty shops. Households in urban areas have higher per capita incomes than those in rural areas and NA-HHs make more than HIV-HHs in both locations (Figure 39).

Per capita income from salary is the main income stream for all households followed by trade/business/petty shops and the sale of land or buildings. There are small variations in the major secondary income stream for HIV-HHs and NA-HHs in urban and rural settings (Figure 40).

For all households and for NA-HHs, male-headed households had higher per capita income than female-headed households (Figure 41) as well as higher mean salaries (695,451MMK vs. 635,900MMK). However, female-headed HIV-HHs had higher per capita income than males (899,967MMK vs. 839,180MMK). Female-headed HIV-HHs made more from trade/business/petty shops (96,750MMK) than male-headed households (68,430MMK). Among NA-HHs female-headed households made significantly more money from the sale of land or buildings (86,326MMK vs. 53,713MMK). Agriculture and related activities, pensions, and remittances made smaller contributions to per capita income. Male-headed HHs had higher income from agriculture than female-headed HHs, while female-headed HHs received more income from pensions and remittances.

For the wealthiest quintile, salaries makes up a slightly smaller proportion of income than for the poorest quintile (74.9% vs. 79.4%; Figure 42). Second to salary, trade/business/petty shops comprise 13.4% for the wealthiest quintile but just 4.8% for the poorest quintile. Agriculture, however, comprises 6.9% of income for the poorest quintile.

Similar to the overall trend, salaries in the lowest quintile for HIV-HHs comprise a greater percentage of total per capita income (82.3%) than NA-HHs (75.8%) and secondary income is split almost evenly between trade/business/petty shops (5.5%) and agriculture (5.2%). In this quintile, NA-HHs make relatively more from agricultural activities (8.9%) and less from trade/business/petty shops (4.0%). For the wealthiest, trade/business/petty shops are the predominant source of secondary income in both HIV-HHs (13.1%) and NA-HHs (13.4%), followed by sale of land/buildings (6.7% for HIV-HHs; 7.4% of NA-HHs). Only a small amount of income is generated from agriculture.

Remittances are inversely related to per capita income for all households. Notably, the poorest non-HIV households receive a greater proportion of per capita income from remittances than HIV-HHs (7.1% versus 3.9%).

4.5. IMPACT OF HIV ON DEPENDENCY RATIOS

HIV-HHs and NA-HHs had similar family dependency ratios\(^{13}\), reflecting the similarity of household age structures (Table 13). Regardless of the number of income earners within households, however, NA-HHs earned more than HIV-HHs on a per capita income basis.

\(^{13}\) The dependency ratio is the population greater than or equal to 65 YOA / population between 16-64 YOA
This information can be compared to the dependency ratios seen throughout the total population of Myanmar. The dependency ratio compares the size of the population of working age (15-64), to those that are either below or above working age and can be considered as dependents. The Demographic Dependency Ratio\textsuperscript{14} outlines the dependency burden of households. In Myanmar the ratio has remained relatively stable over time, with a value of 0.53 (IHLCA, 2011).

4.6. IMPACT OF HIV ON LEVELS OF HOUSEHOLD CONSUMPTION

Arguably the most pertinent aggregate measure of the socio-economic impact of HIV on households is not reductions in labour and income but the “trickle down” effects of HIV on reduced consumption. Decisions about which child stays in school, which parent gets access to medication and what a family eats are reflected in measures of reduced consumption. These decisions may have long-term effects on human development for individuals, households and society. Interpretation of consumption needs to consider that:

1. Respondents were asked to recall the value of items they had purchased or received and did not employ the daily diary methodology used by the CSES - data may be biased towards overestimating the value of items

2. Different timeframes were used for different categories (e.g. spending on food in the last week, education expenses over one year) – bias is expected to be worse for longer recall periods

3. Detailed questioning of food and health expenditure may disproportionately inflate these expenses relative to other categories. This is potentially more a problem for health expenditures which tallied for each individual in the household

Figure 43 shows mean per capita household consumption\textsuperscript{15} by location. HIV-HHs consumed slightly less than NA-HHs (4,162,010MMK/US$3,724 per capita vs. 4,245,343MMK/US$3,799), and all urban households spent more than those in rural locations. The proportion spent on each

\textsuperscript{14} The Demographic Dependency Ratio looks at members of a household below the age of 15 and above the age of 59 compared to those aged 15-59

\textsuperscript{15} Consumption is the total of the expenditures for the household, including values received as gifts or received in-kind.
Chapter 4: Impact of HIV on Economic Factors

Figure 43: Impact of HIV on Household Total Annual Consumption Expenditure, by location

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Location</th>
<th>HIV-HH</th>
<th>NA-HH</th>
<th>Urban</th>
<th>Rural</th>
<th>All</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HH</td>
<td>683,824</td>
<td>761,758</td>
<td>439,728</td>
<td>353,859</td>
<td>583,619</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-HH</td>
<td>144,829</td>
<td>188,429</td>
<td>353,859</td>
<td>353,859</td>
<td>148,809</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Urban</td>
<td>1,051,892</td>
<td>794,514</td>
<td>583,619</td>
<td>421,484</td>
<td>937,383</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rural</td>
<td>641,880</td>
<td>361,038</td>
<td>98,687</td>
<td>361,038</td>
<td>962,630</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>All</td>
<td>1,684,716</td>
<td>1,706,954</td>
<td>1,419,540</td>
<td>1,556,881</td>
<td>1,550,439</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Figure 44: Impact of HIV on Consumption Patterns, by quintile

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Quintile</th>
<th>HIV-HH Households</th>
<th>NA-HH Households</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 1</td>
<td>383.8</td>
<td>1253.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 2</td>
<td>564.7</td>
<td>1437.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 3</td>
<td>662.0</td>
<td>1493.4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 4</td>
<td>681.1</td>
<td>1658.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintile 5</td>
<td>967.7</td>
<td>1970.8</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Legend:
- Other
- Education
- Transportation
- Medical Care
- Rent
- Food
type of item was generally similar for all households including for food (38% of total per capita consumption). Important differences included higher per capita medical care consumption for HIV-HHs with urban HIV-HHs incurring the greatest expenses (1,051,892MMK/US$941 vs. an average of 870,000MMK/US$778).

Urban households paid more for rents (average of 13% (606,013MMK/US$542) vs. 9% (362,217MMK/US$324) for rural households). HIV-HHs allocated a greater proportion of their per capita consumption to transportation than NA-HHs (10% vs. 8%), while spending a slightly smaller proportion on education (3% vs. 4%).

There was little variation in food expenditures within quintiles for HIV-affected and non-affected households, however, the proportion spent on food decreased as wealth increased. The poorest HIV-HHs spent proportionately less on medical care than the poorest NA-HHs, but spent slightly more in other quintiles.

Households were further asked about the impact of HIV or a chronic disease on their reducing their consumption. There was no significant difference in the proportion of HIV-HHS and NA-CD-HHs which reported they had reduced their consumption due to illness (56.9% of HIV-HHs versus 61.6% of NA-CD-HHs). Figure 45 shows that the main areas of restricted spending (for both HIV-HHs and NA-CD-HHs) was food, followed by materials.

Although many HIV-affected and CD-affected households had little or no savings to start with, more than 20% reported drawing on savings to finance the direct and indirect costs associated with HIV or chronic diseases (Table 14). There was no significant difference between HIV-HHs and NA-CD-HHs in the proportion that reduced savings (23.0% vs. 19.4%). In HIV-HHs there were no differences between urban and rural households, but for NA-CD-HHs, those in rural areas were more likely to report decrease of savings (15.6% in urban vs. 24.0% in rural). On average, HIV-
HHs reduced savings by a smaller amount than NA-CD-HHs (362,500MMK /US$324 vs. 588,900MMK/US$5267), but the difference was not significant.

4.7. COPING MECHANISMS: IMPACT OF HIV ON HOUSEHOLD DEBT

Closely linked to the reduction in savings and changes in consumption is the issue of debt accumulation, as loans are often required to address the reduction in income or the change in expenditure profile of the household. Recent years have witnessed a decline in the amount of indebted households throughout the country, from 48% in 2004, to 30% in 2009, with indebtedness being slightly higher in poor households (33% in 2009) than non-poor households (29.4% in 2009) (IHLCA, 2011). Large differences were seen between HIV-affected and non-affected households with regards to debt: 32.6% of HIV-HHs were in debt, compared to only 23.6% of NA-HHs. Male headed households had more loans than female headed HHs (NA-HHs: 227 vs. 69; HIV-HHs: 269 vs. 141) (Figure 46). Male headed households with HIV in rural areas (147 loans) were seen to take out the most loans while urban HIV-HHs headed by women appeared to be incurring the highest interest rates (13% interest rate).

Households relied on differed sources for their loans (Figure 48). NGOs accounted for a slight proportion of loans in both households (8.6% of HIV-HH loans, 15.4% of NA-HH loans). A majority of households relied on moneylenders (41.8% in HIV-HHs vs. 40.1% in NA-HHs). A similar proportion of HA-HHs and NA-HHs relied on friends/neighbours and local relatives (30.9% vs. 32.1%). More NA-HHs were able to obtain a

---

Table 14: Impact of HIV and/or CDs on Household Savings, by location

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Urban HHs</th>
<th>Rural HHs</th>
<th>All HHs</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HHs (n=620)</td>
<td>22.3</td>
<td>23.7</td>
<td>23.0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-CD-HHs (n=179)</td>
<td>15.6</td>
<td>24.0</td>
<td>19.4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HHs (n=636)</td>
<td>23.7</td>
<td>24.0</td>
<td>23.0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-CD-HHs (n=146)</td>
<td>567.1</td>
<td>608.1</td>
<td>589.9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HHs (n=1256)</td>
<td>375.7</td>
<td>608.1</td>
<td>589.9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-CD-HHs (n=325)</td>
<td>589.9</td>
<td>608.1</td>
<td>589.9</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Households reduced savings by a smaller amount than NA-CD-HHs (362,500MMK /US$324 vs. 588,900MMK/US$5267), but the difference was not significant.

Household expenditure needs was the most common reason for taking out a loan. More female HoHs reported taking out loans for illness or injury (non-HIV related) than male HoHs (9.9% vs. 6.4%). Men more often sourced a loan from relatives (NA-HHs: 10.4% males vs. 7.1% females; HIV-HHs: 17.4% vs. 11.3%) and were more likely to receive a loan from a bank (NA-HHs: 6.6% vs. 4.1%; HIV-HHs: 1.8% vs. 1.5%). HIV-HHs headed by women were the most likely to use moneylenders, which may explain the high interest rates they incur.

"Household expenditure needs” was the prime reason households took on debt. Illness was a major reason for the HIV-HHs' loans (14.8%) but uncommon for NA-HHs (2.2%). NA-HHs were more likely to incur debts for home improvements or agricultural production/operations (17.6% vs. 9.5%).
Figure 46: Impact of HIV on Reasons for Household Debt, by sex

Figure 47: Impact of HIV on Reasons for Household Debt, by location
Figure 48: Impact of HIV on Source of Debt and Interest Rates, by location

Figure 49: Source of Debt, by sex of HOH
loan from a bank (6.0%) than HA-HHs (1.7%). These different sources for loans are likely due to a combination of factors: the purpose of the loan (it is easier to get a loan for home improvements from a bank than for health reasons) and possible stigma and discrimination. Additionally, HIV households were more likely to report paying significantly higher monthly interest rates (10.0%) than non-affected households (9.0%).

Fewer wealthier HHs incurred debts than poorer HHs (Figure 50) with a larger decline between Q1 and Q5 for HIV-HHs than NA-HHs. This is interesting, as one would believe that a greater reduction would occur for NA-HHs, as they were likely to have greater savings and earnings.

NA-HHs were more likely to obtain loans from banks and increasing quintiles were associated with an increased likelihood of obtaining a loan (Q1: 2.8% vs Q5: 13.5%). The opposite trend was observed with loans from NGOs with poorer NA-HHs more likely to receive a loan than wealthier households. There was little difference across quintiles in the proportion of HIV-HHs that had a bank loan whereas wealthier HIV-HHs received more loans from NGOs than poorer HHs (Q1: 8.1% vs. Q5: 15.8%). The average amount of loans from moneylenders was consistent from Q1 to Q4, and then dropped for Q5 (44.6% of loans in Q4 vs. 29.8% in Q5).

Interest rates in rural areas did not differ substantially for male HoHs based on quintile of wealth. Female HoHs in urban areas paid higher interest rates if they were in the lowest quintile than if they were in the highest quintile (NA-HHs: Q1=10% interest rate Q5=4% interest rate; HIV-HHs: Q1=10% interest rate, Q5=5% interest rate).

All urban NA-HHs in Q1 headed by a woman got their loan from a moneylender, whereas the majority of female-headed HIV-HHs sourced their loan from friends/neighbours (41.2%). Loans from NGOs decreased with increases in wealth for NA-HHs while they increased across quintiles for HIV-HHs (Male HoHs: Q1=6.6%, Q5=8.8%; Female HoHs: Q1=12.5%, Q5=26.1%). NGOs may need to improve the targeting of loans to those most in need.
CHAPTER 5
IMPACT OF HIV ON EDUCATION

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- Children living in HIV-HHs reported lower attendance rates than those in NA-HHs but had similar primary school Net Attendance Rates.
- There was a large difference in attendance rate between HIV-HHs and NA-HHs for girls 10-13 years (91.1% in HIV-HHs versus 96.0% in NA-HHs).
- Children in HIV-HHs were twice more likely to have missed school compared to NA-HHs because they had to contribute to the household income or help with household chores.
- Children in HIV-HHs were more likely to have missed more than 10 days of school in the past year than those in NA-HHs, especially for young children and those in rural areas.
- There were no differences in the proportion of children who had repeated a grade by type of household.

Beyond reducing the immediate economic capacity of the household, diseases can influence the human capital accumulation of the household and, therefore, long-term impacts by negatively affecting the education of children. Figure 51 summarises the ages at which children in Myanmar are expected to progress through each schooling level.

5.1. IMPACT OF HIV ON SCHOOL ATTENDANCE

One of the most critical measures of a child’s educational status is one of the most basic – whether or not they are currently attending school. Figure 52 and Figure 53 display the results of analyses related to school attendance rates. In this case, the analysis looked at all levels of education and various kinds of schooling, including non-formal or vocational training. Overall, children in NA-HHs had marginally higher aggregate attendance rates for schooling at all levels than children in HIV-HHs (Figure 52 and Figure 53). The biggest difference in attendance rates for boys was among those in upper secondary school (14-18 years) while for girls it was among those in lower secondary school (10-13 years). A larger difference was seen for male children as those in HIV-HHs had attendance rates of only 81.5%, compared to 84.4% in non-affected HHs. For girls there were only minimal differences (84.3% attendance in HIV-HHs compared to 84.9% in NA-HHs). Additionally, NA-HHs had higher attendance levels across all age groups, but saw the largest
The Socio-Economic Impact of People Living with HIV at the Household Level in Myanmar
Chapter 5: Impact of HIV on Education

The difference in the lower secondary (or middle school) years of 10-13 years of age (90.8% attendance for children in HIV-HHs versus 95.3% in NA-HHs).

When broken down by both age and gender, the largest difference between HIV-HHs and NA-HHs was seen in boys 14-18 YOA. In HIV-HHs, attendance rate was only 53.7% (the lowest attendance rate of any age / gender group) while in NA-HHs it was 60.4%. In contrast, for girls at that age there was no difference in the level of attendance (62.8% attendance for girls in HIV-HHs versus 62.3% in NA-HHs). However, girls 10-13 years of age saw a comparatively large difference (91.1% in HIV-HHs versus 96.0% in NA-HHs), though it was not statistically significant. Overall, residing in a HIV-HH had a negative impact on the likelihood of a child attending school. There were insufficient numbers of school-aged children living in a NA-HH with a member living with a chronic disease to make any meaningful comparisons regarding the impact of chronic diseases on school attendance.

The gender of the HoH influenced the proportion of children who missed 10 days or more of school for HIV-HH but not for NA-HHs. In female-headed HIV-HHs, 10.3% of children missed 10 days of school or more compared to 8.9% of those in male HoH.

In all households, children in female HoHs were more likely to skip a grade than households headed by men (NA-HHs: 12.3% vs. 10.2%; HIV-HH: 13.9% vs. 10.9%).

Only a small number of children were reported to have never attended school, another important educational measure. Figure 54 shows encouraging results with this indicator, as there was less than one-point difference in the overall percentage of children in HIV-HHs (2.5%) compared to NA-HHs (1.7%) who were reported never having attended school. However, while no difference is seen for girls (1.9% for girls in HIV-HHs versus 1.8% in NA-HHs) almost twice the proportion of HIV-HHs had boys who never attended school compared to boys in NA-HHs (3.1% for boys in HIV-HHs versus 1.6% in NA-HHs).

Different indicators are used to measure enrolment (utilising school data) or atten-

Figure 51: The Educational System in Myanmar

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Level</th>
<th>Length of Time (Years)</th>
<th>Age</th>
<th>Grade</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Primary</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lower</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>5+ to 7+</td>
<td>1 to 4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Upper</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>8+ to 9+</td>
<td>4 to 5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Secondary</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lower</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>10+ to 13+</td>
<td>6 to 9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Upper</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>14+ to 15+</td>
<td>10 to 11</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Source: Ministry of Education, Department of Higher Education (Lower Myanmar), 2013
Figure 52: Impact of HIV on Males’ Current School Attendance, by age

Figure 53: Impact of HIV on Females’ Current School Attendance, by age
dance\textsuperscript{16} (utilising school or survey data) within the country: a net rate and a gross rate. How the different rates are calculated is shown above, using primary school as an example. The Net Attendance Rate (NAR), which can be calculated using the survey data, is the focus of this section.

Figure 54: Impact of HIV on Children who have Never Attended School

Figure 57 displays the NAR of boys and girls for the different educational levels. Overall, for Myanmar, the MICS 2009-2010 survey found a NAR of 90.2 for children of primary school age, with the rate being similar across boys and girls.\textsuperscript{17} In the surveyed households, however, the primary school NAR was 88.3, and there was an interesting difference between boys and girls (girls have a higher NAR of 90.5 versus 86.5 for boys). The NAR for all primary school aged children (5-9 years of age) was the same for both HIV-HHs and NA-HHs. However, the primary school NAR was slightly higher for girls in HIV-HHs, and slightly lower for boys, than in NA-HHs.

Overall, data from the MICS showed the NAR in Myanmar was 58.3 for children of secondary school age (10-15), with the numbers being similar across boys and girls.\textsuperscript{18} Survey responses show similar results. The survey showed a small difference between boys and girls of secondary school age (girls NAR of 60.9 versus 58.2 for boys). There were relatively no differences between boys and girls within NA-HHs nor differences between girls in HIV-HHs and NA-HHs. However, severe differences were seen for boys in secondary school, where the NAR for NA-HHs: 63.3 compared to only 52.3 in HIV-HHs).

Data from the MICS show that nationally the NAR in rural areas is lower than in urban areas (primary NAR urban 89.2 versus rural 93.0; secondary NAR urban 76.0 versus rural 52.0). Figure 57 shows the impact of HIV on NARs in the surveyed households, by the location of the household. Overall for the surveyed households, NARs were similar for HIV-HHs and NA-HHs in urban and rural areas for children of primary school ages. However, for NA-HH children at secondary school age, differences are seen, with an NAR of 66.7 in urban areas compared to only 62.6 in rural areas. Additionally, for rural households, secondary school-age children in HIV-HHs saw worse NARs than their peers in NA-HHs (54.6 for HIV-HHs versus 58.3 for NA-HHs).

When children are not attending school, it

\textsuperscript{16} Due to the nature of this report being based on household survey results, attendance, not enrolment is reported.

\textsuperscript{17} Ministry of National Planning and Economic Development, Ministry of Health, UNICEF, Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey 2009-2010, October 2011, Page 44

\textsuperscript{18} Ministry of National Planning and Economic Development, Ministry of Health, UNICEF, Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey 2009-2010, October 2011, Page 44
Figure 55: Impact of HIV on Primary School Net Attendance Rates, by sex

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Boys</th>
<th>Girls</th>
<th>All</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HH</td>
<td>85.6</td>
<td>91.9</td>
<td>88.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-HH</td>
<td>87.2</td>
<td>89.2</td>
<td>88.1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Figure 56: Impact of HIV on Secondary School Net Attendance Rates, by sex

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Boys</th>
<th>Girls</th>
<th>All</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>HIV-HH</td>
<td>52.3</td>
<td>60.9</td>
<td>56.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NA-HH</td>
<td>63.3</td>
<td>61.0</td>
<td>62.1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Chapter 5: Impact of HIV on Education

Figure 57: Impact of HIV on Net Attendance Rates (NAR), by educational level and location

Figure 58: Impact of HIV on reasons for Non-Attendance, by sex
is important to understand the reasons for their non-attendance. Overall, the most frequent reason given for why children were not at school was that the child was sick (NA-HHs 88.4% vs. HIV-HHs 75.0%). Children were said to be absent from school because they had to contribute to the household income or help with household chores in a much higher proportion of HIV-HHs than NA-HHs (12.7% vs. 5.9%). A small proportion of HIV-HHs (3.6%) even stated that children missed school because they had to collect ART for their family member with HIV. Figure 58 shows that in both sets of households, girls were more likely than boys to miss school because they had to work to contribute to the household income or because they needed to help with chores (8.4% boys in HIV-HHs vs. 17.1% girls in HIV-HHs and 4.7% boys and 7.3% girls in NA-HHs). HIV then, is having a clear impact on child school attendance with girls most affected.

5.2. IMPACT OF HIV ON SCHOOL ABSENCES AND GRADE REPETITION

Figure 59 shows the impact of HIV on the percentage of children reported to have missed 10 or more school days in the previous year based on the gender of the HoH. Almost one-third more children in HIV-HHs (9.3%) missed over 10 days of school in the previous year than in NA-HHs (6.6%). Those children aged 5–9 years who live in HIV-HHs were almost twice as likely as those in NA-HHs to have missed more than 10 days of school (11.1% versus 7.3%) as were those 10-13 years of age (10.9% versus 5.9%). However, there was no statistically significant difference among older children who had missed more than 10 days of school by type of household (6% for both). Children in rural HIV-HHs were most affected with 10.4% having missed more than 10 days of school.
Figure 60: Impact of HIV on School Absences, by age of child

Figure 61: Impact of HIV on Grade Repetition
of school in the previous year compared to only 7.8% of those in rural NA-HHs. There was also a lesser difference in urban areas (8.1% HIV-HHs; 5.4% NA-HHs).

There were no statistically significant differences in the proportion of children who repeated a grade by the gender of the HoH, type of household or age of the child (Figure 61). 13.2% of children from HIV-HHs with a female HoH repeated a grade, whereas 10.9% of children in male head of HIV-HHs repeated a grade, but that difference was not significant. There were also no statistically significant differences in grade repetition by sector of the household, nor age of the child.
CHAPTER 6
IMPACT OF HIV ON HEALTH

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- Members of HIV-affected households were reported to be in worse health status than those in NA-HHs. However, PLCD self-reported having lower health status than PLHIV.
- Members of poorer households (both HIV-affected and non-affected) were reported to be in worse health status than those in wealthier households.
- PLHIV utilised significantly more ambulatory and inpatient health services, and were significantly more likely to seek care in the public sector, than those in NA-HHs.
- PLHIV were more likely to currently use tobacco or betel nut than those not living with HIV (regardless of their chronic disease status).
- PLHIV were a little more likely to have reported heavy drinking patterns, and those who did were more likely to have missed ART in the previous week than those who did not report heavy drinking.
- Individuals living with a chronic disease (excluding HIV) were more likely to state they rarely or never performed physical activities than individuals not diagnosed with a chronic disease.
- Non-affected household members were less than half as likely as HIV-affected household members to indicate they did not seek care due to insufficient money.
- Almost five times as many PLHIV were hospitalised in the previous year compared to individuals living in NA-HHs (14.1% vs. 2.9%).
- PLHIV were significantly more satisfied with their access to health services than survey respondents in NA-HHs.
- Charges for health care services reported by members of HIV-affected households were significantly lower than those reported by members of NA-HHs, except for female-headed HIV-HHs, which had higher charges than their NA-HH female-headed counterparts.
- PLHIV were more likely to have healthcare charges exempted than members of NA-HHs.
- PLHIV reported selling land and other assets, cutting into savings and taking on debt, in order to cover costs associated with prolonged illness prior to diagnosis. However, the amounts were lower than those of NA-HHs.
ART utilisation is increasing among all PLHIV. However, utilisation of medications to prevent or treat opportunistic infections is lower for PLHIV living in rural areas.

There was a slight difference between the proportion of HIV-affected and NA-HHs who had incurred catastrophic health expenditures, with HIV households only spending 1.5 times more than NA-HHs.

6.1. IMPACT OF HIV AND CHRONIC DISEASES ON HOUSEHOLD HEALTH STATUS

6.1.1. Self-reported Health Status

The head of household was asked to rate the health status of household members (Figure 63). Those without a chronic disease or HIV (PLNODX) were regarded as having the best health (86% were in good or very good health), while PLCD were most likely to report being in bad or very bad health (17.4%). This was a significantly higher proportion of PLHIV (6.7%). Men generally reported having better health than women, and urban dwellers better health than those in rural areas.

For HIV-HHs, there was a clear positive correlation between the economic status of households and reported health of residents (Q5: 83% rated health as good or very good vs. Q1: 74%) (Figure 64). HIV-HHs consistently rated health as poorer than those in NA-HHs across quintiles (3.9% of household members were ranked as having bad or very bad health compared to 1.5%).

6.2. IMPACT OF HIV ON BEHAVIOURAL RISK FACTORS

While certain behaviours pose risks for the transmission of HIV, a diagnosis of HIV may itself lead to behaviours that put people at higher risk of developing other chronic diseases. Substance abuse (e.g. tobacco, alcohol) and low levels of physical activity can compound illness experienced by PLHIV. Minimising unhealthy behaviours and encouraging healthy behaviours are just as important for PLHIV as they are for everyone else, but are frequently overlooked elements of care for PLHIV.
Figure 63: Reported Health Status of Household Members, by location

Figure 64: Reported Health Status of Household Members, by quintile

6.2.1. Tobacco Use

PLHIV are at a higher risk of heart disease than those not living with the disease due to the direct effects of HIV, side effects of antiretroviral therapies and, in many places, higher levels of smoking (American Heart Association, 2015). Smoking can lower CD4 cell levels increasing the risk of opportunistic infections (Australian Federation of AIDS Organisations, 2009). In India, for example, PLHIV are at a very high risk of tobacco-related disease and death (21.3%). Smoking-cessation programs are not commonly included as part of HIV programs – the current HIV National Strategy for Myanmar makes no mention of tobacco-cessation programs for PLHIV.

In this survey, 41.9% of PLHIV over the age of 15 were using tobacco or betel nut (Figure 65). That compares to only 31.5% of PLCD and 27.7% of PLNODX. There was no significant difference in tobacco/betel nut use between PLHIV with and without another chronic disease (44.3% (n=228) vs. 43.0% (n=1027)). Men with HIV were more likely to be using these products than other males (67.3% PLHIV; 52.2% PLCD; 46.5% PLNODX). Overall, men were almost four times more likely to be using tobacco/betel nut than women. There were no significant differences between urban and rural households or across quintiles of wealth.

6.2.2. Alcohol Use

There is controversy about the direct effect of alcohol on CD4 levels, however, heavy drinkers are more likely to miss antiretroviral treatment than non-drinkers (Baum, M. K., et al, 2010).

In this survey, PLHIV were no more likely to drink heavily than PLCD or PLNODX. Overall, 2.5% of PLHIV aged ≥14 years reported drinking either at least 5-6 standard drinks per day once a week (based on gender) compared to 2.1% of PLNODX and 1.4% PLCD. For all three groups, males were significantly more likely to report heavy drinking than females (PLHIV: 4.2% for males vs. 1.0% for females; PLCD: 2.6% vs. 0.8%; PLNODX 4.4% vs. 0.2%). Among men and women without HIV or a chronic disease, the proportion of heavy drinkers differed by a factor of more than 20.

In Myanmar, there are indications that PLHIV who drink heavily at least once per week may be interrupting their HIV treatment: 13.3% of PLHIV reported they missed a dose of ART because they were either drinking or taking drugs and 5% of heavy drinkers reported missing a dose of ART compared to only 1% of people who did not drink heavily. However, there were few respondents and the latter difference was not statistically significant.

6.2.3. Physical Activity

As discussed earlier, HIV has been associated with a two-fold increase in Cardiovascular Disease (CVD) risk. Lifestyle interventions, including diet and Physical Activity (PA), have been reported in reducing CVD risk in the general population, however there is little information available on the physical activity levels of PLHIV within Myanmar.

At the individual level, PLHIV were slightly less likely than PLNODX to state that they “rarely or never” performed physical activities (11.2% versus 14.5%), however, PLCD were the most likely to state that they never or rarely performed physical activities (20.8%). By household type, there was little difference in the proportion of household members reporting that they did little to no physical activity by household type, but members of the wealthiest households were more likely to do some form of physical activity than those in the poorest households.

6.3. IMPACT OF HIV ON UTILISATION OF HEALTH SERVICES

6.3.1. Impact of HIV on Ambulatory Health Service Utilisation

A greater percentage of PLCD sought outpatient care in the previous four weeks than PLHIV or PLNODX (84.6% of PLCD; 74.8% of PLHIV; 66.8% of PLNODX; Figure 66). This pattern was also the case for male-headed households but not for female-led homes. There were no significant differences in utilisation patterns among urban and rural households compared to those in rural households (although the differences between categories of individuals remained significantly different, within each sector). Female-headed households had no significant differences between types of individuals, nor were individuals in female-headed households less likely to report having sought care than those in male-headed households. However, within male-headed households again PLCD were significantly more likely to seek care than PLHIV and PLNODX.
More PLHIV in urban areas preferred private clinics (34.9%) than PLCD (22.9%) and PLNODX (19.0%) (Figure 68). There were no significant differences in rural areas. HIV-HHs in the third quintile made more use of ambulatory services than the other households (78.4%), while NA-HHs ranked in the highest quintile had higher utilisation rates than those in the lowest economic quintiles (76.2% vs. 58.0%) (Figure 69).

Different reasons for not seeking health care were given by people who were ill in the previous four weeks but did not seek care (Figure 70): PLNODX were more likely to state they self-medicated (46.5% vs. <40% for PLCD and PLHIV), while more PLHIV said that the illness was not serious enough to merit a visit to the doctor (48.5% vs. ≤40% for PLCD and PLNODX). In rural areas, PLCD were the most likely to state that the health facility was too far (20% vs. 7% of PLHIV and <1% of PLNODX) and PLNODX said that healthcare was too expensive (11% vs. 0% of PLCD and 7% of PLHIV). Men and women voiced similar reasons why they did not seek care for a recent illness.
Figure 68: Location of OP provider

Figure 69: Utilisation of Ambulatory Health Care Services in the Previous 4 Weeks, by quintile
Chapter 6: Impact of HIV on Health

Figure 70: Reasons for Not Seeking Care when Sick, by location

Figure 71: Reasons for Not Seeking Care when Sick, by sex
6.3.2. Impact of HIV on Inpatient Health Service Utilisation

As a proportion, almost 5 times as many PLHIV were hospitalised in the past year than PLNODX (14.1% vs. 2.6%) and over 33% more than PLCD (10.8%) (Figure 72).

6.3.3. Impact of HIV on Satisfaction with Access to Health Services

According to national data, access to health care, defined as people living within an hour’s walking distance of a hospital or health centre, is high throughout Myanmar (81%) and similar for poor (77%) and non-poor people (82%) (IHLCA, 2011). Rural populations face greater challenges in accessing health care than urban residents (75% and 96% respectively) (IHLCA, 2011), a pattern reflected in regional and state differences (e.g. poor access in Sagaing (62%) and Chin (68%).

Suggestive of the recent expansion in services for PLHIV, PLHIV-INT were more likely to report being satisfied or very satisfied with their access to care than PLCD-INT and PLNODX-INT (73.3% of PLHIV-INT vs. 58.2% for PLCD-INT and 53.7% for PLNODX-INT) (Figure 73). Only a minority of people in each group reported being dissatisfied.

6.4. IMPACT OF HIV AND CHRONIC DISEASES ON OUT-OF-POCKET HEALTH EXPENDITURES

National data from 2010 show that expenditures on health care comprised 5% of total household income with the poor (3.7%) spending less than the non-poor (5.1%) (IHLCA, 2011). Similarly, people in rural areas spent less of the household budget on health than urban dwellers (4.4% vs. 5.9%) (IHLCA, 2011).

6.4.1. Impact of HIV and CD on Total Health Care Expenditures

On average, annual per capita household out-of-pocket health expenditures for HIV-HHs are almost double those of NA-HHs (304,558MMK/US$272.41 vs. 163,405MMK/US$146.16). Total per capita OOP health expenditures were lower than for NA-HHs that have a member with a chronic disease at 259,533MMK or US$232 for HIV-HHs without a chronic disease member compared to 275,218MMK or US$246 for NA-HHs that have a member with a chronic disease. The lowest was for NA-HHs without a member with a chronic disease (123,405MMK/US$110) and highest for HIV-HHs with a member living with chronic disease (406,709MMK/US$364). At the individual level, PLHIV who also had a comorbid chronic disease incur substantially higher health costs than those with HIV alone (883,128MMK/US$790 vs. 109,716MMK/US$98), over eight (8) times more.

Policy makers may need to consider the economic impact of comorbidities on individuals and households in HIV-affected households, as well as the financial impacts of chronic diseases in NA-HHs.

6.4.2. Impact of HIV and CD on Ambulatory Charges

Figure 74 highlights the average charges for ambulatory health services reported for household members in the previous four weeks. It should be noted that these are the
Figure 72: Inpatient Utilisation

Figure 73: Impact of HIV on Satisfaction with Access to Health Services

Figure 74: Impact of HIV on Ambulatory Charges, by sex of HoH and location
Members of HIV-HHs, on average, had significantly lower charges for care than NA-HH members. This is likely due to the many free services available to PLHIV provided by the public and not-for-profit NGO sectors. PLHIV are eligible for free ART and OI treatments and HIV-HHs also had markedly lower charges for medications (5,577MMK/US$5 vs. 8,898MMK/US$8). Rural NA-HHs paid 325% more than rural HIV-HHs, and transportation costs for NA-HH members were almost 4.5 times those of HIV-HH members. Against these trends, recent health charges per household member (previous four weeks) were higher for HIV-affected households presumably because of a higher likelihood of requiring a healthcare visit. In addition, urban HIV-HHs paid around 150% more than NA-HHs, and female-headed HIV-HHs spent almost three times more than NA-HHs (50,285MMK/US$45 vs. 17,341MMK/US$16).

6.4.3. Impact of HIV on Inpatient Care Charges

As with ambulatory care, HIV-HH members incurred lower charges for inpatient health services in the last 12 months than people in NA-HHs except for female-headed households, where HIV-HH households had higher expenditures (318,078MMK/US$284.47 vs. 298,057MMK/US$266.56; Figure 75). Overall, the charges for hospitalisations incurred by members of NA-HHs in the previous 12 months were 141% higher than for members of HIV-HHs (363,231MMK/US$325 vs. 257,076MMK/US$230).

Figure 75: Impact of HIV on Inpatient Health Care Charges, by sex of HoH

6.5. Impact of HIV on Source of Funds for Health Care Charges

6.5.1. Impact of HIV on Source of Funds for Ambulatory Out of Pocket Expenditures

Survey respondents were asked to list up to three methods they used to cover the charges for their visits, and estimate the proportion that each contributed towards the total cost of care (Figure 76). For example, if a visit cost $10, and $3 was paid from household earnings, $4 was exempt and $3 was borrowed, it would be indicated that 30% of their visit was paid from earnings, 40% through exemptions and 30% through borrowed money. As such, the data represents the value of the various sources of funds for ambulatory costs, not the percentage of the time that households used the method (which would be 33% for each).
Both HIV-affected and non-affected households covered a greater percentage of the ambulatory charges through household earnings (41% and 34% respectively) and other sources of funds contributed similar proportions for both household types including borrowing money. For both NA-HHs and HIV-HHs, the charges were also covered by using savings, receiving money and borrowing money. While it would be expected that HIV-HHs have a lower capacity to borrow money, HIV-HHs and NA-HHs borrow nearly the same amount to cover ambulatory care (27% versus 28%, respectively). Non-affected household members also used household earnings to cover 1.3 times the charges of PLHIV. This is again likely to be a result of both positive policies and lower earning potential within HIV-HHs. Respondents were asked if they paid more than the “official” amount for ambulatory care services, but <1% (5 respondents) said that they did. This may imply that extra payments are not a major issue in Myanmar, although participants may have been reluctant to discuss this.

6.6. CATASTROPHIC HEALTH EXPENDITURES

Health expenditures that threaten a household’s financial capacity to maintain its subsistence are termed “catastrophic” and does not necessarily equate to high health care costs. Even relatively small expenditures on health can be financially disastrous for poor households or households that have high previous debt levels. The ability of HIV-HHs and the poor to cope with even very low health expenditures, compared to richer households, is explored in this section using multivariate analysis. The WHO estimates that families who allocate more than 40% of their non-food expenditure to health care are likely to be impoverished (The World Health Report, 2000). There is no consensus on the catastrophic threshold and cut-off values, thus, this analysis presents the data from a 40% cut-off level.

Households with a low income or headed by an elderly person or with members with... a chronic disease including HIV are usually considered to be at higher risk of catastrophic expenditures. On average, about 10% of all surveyed households reported a catastrophic expenditure with spending at or above 40% of non-food consumption. HIV-HHs are significantly more likely to have a catastrophic expenditure than NA-HHs (11.4% vs. 7.6%). This is consistent with a number of other countries in the region such as India and Indonesia. In Myanmar, however, 1.5 times as many HIV-HHs reported catastrophic health expenditures than NA-HHs as compared to three times the number in both India and Indonesia.

HIV-HHs and NA-HHs with a PLCD were more likely to incur catastrophic expenditures than those without a PLCD. For instance, NA-HHs with a PLCD were 2.6 times more likely to have catastrophic expenditures than NA-HHs without a PLCD. Female-headed HIV-HHs where someone also had a chronic disease had the highest levels of, catastrophic expenditures (17% as compared to 12% of male headed HIV and chronic disease affected households.)

6.6.1. Cross-diagnosis of tuberculosis and HIV

Myanmar has a high burden of HIV and tuberculosis/HIV co-infection - 22% of people newly diagnosed with TB are also living with HIV, which is almost four times the regional average (WHO, 2012). The current survey results also show a high prevalence of HIV among patients diagnosed with TB (almost 54%). Additionally, over 9% of PLHIV also reported being diagnosed with TB compared to 1% of individuals not living with HIV.

6.6.2. ART Utilization by PLHIV

At the end of 2013, an estimated 54% of those in need of treatment were said to be receiving ART (UNAIDS, 2014). This is an improvement on 2009, when ART coverage was only 28% (Myanmar Ministry of Health, 2011). The number of ART treatment sites has increased from 57 sites in 2008 to 147 sites in 2013 (UNAIDS, 2014). More than 88% of PLHIV in this survey were receiving ART and 43% were on medications for opportunistic infections. These figures are much higher than UNAIDS estimates and are likely due to the recruitment of PLHIV from ART clinics. There were no differences in utilisation of these medications among rural and urban PLHIV (Figure 77) or across wealth quintiles (Figure 78). However, while overall coverage in rural and urban areas is similar, rural PLHIV in later stages of infection (CD4 count <200) who benefit most from OI medications are receiving proportionally less (61.5% vs. 67% in urban areas; Figure 79).
Figure 77: Utilisation of ART and Medications for OI, by location

Figure 78: Utilisation of Medications, by quintile

Figure 79: Utilisation of Medications for OI, by stage of infection and location
CHAPTER 7
IMPACT OF HIV ON FOOD SECURITY

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- Only small differences exist in the reported number of daily meals between the members of HIV-affected and non-affected households.
- However, members of HIV-HHs were significantly more likely to report being hungry but not eating due to lack of food, than members of NA-HHs.
- Female-headed HIV-HHs were almost 10 times more likely to go hungry than male-headed NA-HHs (10% compared to 1.5%).
- HIV-affected households received food support at significantly higher levels than non-affected households, and a greater percentage of poor HIV-households received food support than wealthier households.

The nutritional status of a population is critical to a country’s economic progress and numerous studies have linked individual caloric intake to productivity and income later in life (e.g., Fogel, 2000; Hernandez, Fuentes and Pascual, 2001). The high prevalence of poverty in Myanmar is one reason that nearly three million people are classified as food poor (WFP, 2015) and 35% of children aged under 5 years are stunted (WFP, 2015). HIV is an additional factor that impacts on individual nutrition and household food security. “The relationship between HIV/AIDS and malnutrition is a particularly extreme example of the vicious cycle of immune dysfunction, infectious disease and malnutrition”19. This section examines the effect of HIV on household food security and the impact of food assistance programs currently in place.

7.1. IMPACT OF HIV ON HUNGER

Reports of hunger were categorised by four household types: HIV-CD-HH (HIV-HHs where there are also PLCD living), HIV-HH-NOCD (HIV-HHs without a PLCD), NA-CD-HH (NA-HHs with a PLCD member) and NA-HH-NOCD (NA-HHs with only members living with no diagnosis). The percentage of household members who “didn’t eat because there wasn’t enough food” was significantly higher for HIV-HHs than NA-HHs (6.4% vs. 1.6% overall), regardless of whether a member had a chronic disease or not, were headed by women or men, or were located in a rural or urban area.

Chapter 7: Impact of HIV on Food Security

Figure 80: Impact of HIV and CDs on members “not eating because there was not enough food”, by sex

Figure 81: Impact of HIV and CDs on members “not eating because there was not enough food”, by location

Figure 82: % of Members that Reported being Hungry, by type of household and sex of HoH
Female-headed households for all four HH types were more likely to report not eating than male-headed households (Figure 80). Female-headed HIV-HHs were over nine times more likely to go hungry than male-headed NA-HHs. These findings suggest that female-headed HIV-HHs have a particular need for food assistance.

Hunger was a much more significant issue for poor households than for wealthier households and a greater problem for HIV-HHs (Figure 84).

7.2. IMPACT OF HIV ON HOUSEHOLDS RECEIVING FOOD SUPPORT

Substantially more HIV-HHs received food support than NA-HHs (15.3% vs. 4.0%). Just 50 NA-HHs received food support in the previous month, making detailed segregated analysis less statistically robust. There was no difference in the annual value of food support received by HIV-HHs in urban and rural areas ($17,309 vs. $17,284); however, a greater proportion of urban HIV-
HHs received support (16.1% vs. 14.5%). For over 96% of the HIV-HHs, food support commenced as a result of HIV diagnosis, highlighting the effective targeting of food support programs.

For the vast majority of HIV-HHs (92.2%), food support consisted of additional food (Figure 85). Additional food represented a significant portion of the food support received by NA-HHs (74.0%), but they also received cash for food purchases (24.0%), compared to only 7.3% of the HIV-affected households.

Regardless of economic status, HIV-HHs were considerably more likely to have received food support in the previous month (Figure 86). More HIV-HHs in the lowest economic quintile received assistance than those in the highest quintile (23.0% in Q1 vs. 7.6% in Q5), another indication that food programs have effective targeting mechanisms. The value of food support across quintiles for HIV-HHs did vary, with less received by those in Q1 compared with Q5 (17,040MMK/US$15.24 per month in food vs. 22,431MMK/US$20). Numbers in Q5, however, were small.

There was a wide variation across states/regions in the proportion of HIV-HHs that received food support (Figure 87) from a high of 53.7% in Magway to a low of 5.1% in Ayeyarwaddy. Similarly, the value of the food support varied from a high of 46,442MMK/US$42 in Kayin to a low of 5,563MMK/US$5 in Bago. These large disparities may be due to the sampling methodology, as the study did not aim to determine differences across states/regions. However, the results raise concerns about the equity of food support programs throughout Myanmar.

Figure 86: Impact of HIV on Households Receiving Food Support, by quintile

Figure 87: Food Support for HIV-Affected Households, by state / region
CHAPTER 8
IMPACT OF HIV ON STIGMA, DISCRIMINATION AND QUALITY OF LIFE

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- PLCD experience higher percentages of stigma compared to PLHIV.
- PLHIV were more likely to avoid getting married because of their health status, and to avoid going to local clinics or hospitals when they needed to.
- The majority of married PLHIV and PLCD reported disclosing their status to their spouse or partner immediately after diagnosis.
- Discrimination from healthcare workers was higher for PLHIV than PLCD, yet still remained relatively low compared to historical levels and neighbouring countries (5.8%).
- 6.0% of PLHIV and 8.6% PLCD reported to have lost their job or been refused employment because of their disease.
- PLHIV were more likely to rate their quality of life as poor or very poor compared to PLCD and HoHWCD (26.8% PLHIV vs. 20.7% PLCD vs. 12.7% HoHWCD)
- Higher levels of depression and anxiety were seen in PLHIV than PLCD or HoHWCD.
- PLHIV were much more likely to report not having sufficient money to meet their needs.
- PLHIV reported higher levels of satisfaction with healthcare services compared to both PLCD and HoHWCD.
- Higher levels of self-reported disability were seen in PLCD than in PLHIV.

HIV can have a traumatic impact on an individual’s sense of self-worth, personal security and social standing within the household and community (USAID, 2006). Emotional, mental and sometimes physical manifestations of stigma and discrimination can further reduce an individual’s capacity to engage in productive economic activities. Stigma and discrimination may deter people from accessing HIV testing and treatment, sharing their diagnosis and taking action to protect PLHIV. Figure 88 illustrates how three different aspects of HIV-related stigma and discrimination (internal stigma, stigma and discrimination) can lead to a pernicious cycle. Social stigma can fuel discriminatory actions against PLHIV, driving internal stigma that compounds isolation, which in turn generates further stigma in the community.

Figure 88: Conceptual Framework for Stigma, Discrimination and Internal Stigma

Source: USAID, 2006

8.1. INTERNAL STIGMA

National studies have found that 11% of people with HIV were often excluded from social gatherings because of their HIV status (Myanmar Positive Group & MMRD Research Services, 2010). Levels of internal stigma recorded in this study were much higher and even well above levels reported in a similar study in Cambodia (17%) (Figure 89): 27.6% of PLHIV had either avoided a social gathering or isolated themselves from friends and family in the preceding 12 months. Surprisingly PLCD experience just as much and for some aspects considerably more internal stigma than PLHIV. Over 14% of PLHIV in Myanmar (cf. 10% in Cambodia) and 30% of PLCD reported they stopped work because of their illness. Opportunities for job promotion (13.6% PLHIV vs. 30.1% PLCD) and education (15.9% PLHIV vs. 17.8% PLCD) were missed. A majority of PLHIV and PLCD avoided getting married (64.3% PLHIV vs. 58.8% PLCD), and small proportions kept away from the local clinic (9.0% PLHIV vs. 5.9% PLCD) and hospital (7.0% PLHIV vs. 6.7% PLCD) even when they needed care.

8.2. DISCRIMINATION

The majority of married PLHIV reported disclosing their status to their spouse or partner immediately after diagnosis (89.91%), and just 0.51% said that they had still not informed their spouse. These figures are similar to PLCD: 95.6% informed their spouse immediately (though 0% elected to not tell their spouse). Discrimination from health providers was relatively infrequent (only 5.8% PLHIV and 0.4% PLCD) compared to some other countries, such as in India where 13% of PLHIV reported being discriminated against by health workers, and below levels recorded in a 2010 national Myanmar study that found 10% of people had been refused health services because of their HIV sta-
The Socio-Economic Impact of HIV at the Household Level in Myanmar

Chapter 8: Impact of HIV on Stigma, Discrimination and Quality of Life

The same 2010 study found that 24% of PLHIV had faced discrimination from their employer with 15% refused employment because of their HIV status (Myanmar Positive Group & MMRD Research Services, 2010). This contrasts with 6.0% of PLHIV in this study (and 8.6% PLCD) who were sacked or refused employment. PLHIV said that they were not employed because of poor health (58.6%), a combination of discrimination and poor health (19.0%) or discrimination alone (17.2%). A small group of PLHIV (3.9%) and PLCD (1.3%) missed job opportunities because of their disease; larger proportions claimed that their status even adversely affected the job prospects of family members (8.1% of PLHIV and 9.6% of PLCD). Only 1.9% of PLHIV and 1.6% of PLCD said that they lost an educational opportunity because of their sickness.

8.3. QUALITY OF LIFE

A series of quality of life related questions were asked of PLHIV-INT in HIV-HHs, PLCD-INT in NA-HHs and the HoH for NA-HHs without a PLCD (Hohnocd). Significantly greater numbers of PLHIV than PLCD or PLNODX rated their life as poor or very poor (26.8% PLHIV; 20.3% PLCD; 12.8% HoHNOCD) (Figure 90) and more reported being frequently depressed or anxious (Figure 91).

With regards to their overall health, PLHIV and PLCD reported significantly lower satisfaction (22.3% for PLHIV; 25.7% PLCD; 9.7% PLNODX; Figure 92). PLHIV were also much more likely to have felt they did not have sufficient money to meet their needs (52.5% PLHIV; 41.0% PLCD; 31.0% PLNODX). These findings highlight the financial and mental pressures the disease exerts above and beyond non-HIV chronic diseases (Figure 93).

---

20 People are classified as being frequently depressed of anxious if they consider their depression/anxiety to occur ‘quite often,’ ‘very often,’ or ‘always’

21 Low satisfaction refers to people that rate their satisfaction levels as either dissatisfied or very dissatisfied

---

Figure 90: Impact of HIV and CDs on Quality of Life (QoL) and Despair, Anxiety and Depression*

---

87
Figure 91: Impact of HIV and CDs on Being Depressed or Anxious*

Figure 92: Impact of HIV and CDs on Satisfaction Levels with Health

Figure 93: Impact of HIV and CDs on Sense of Financial Security and Mobility
8.4. DISABILITY ASSESSMENT

Questions relating to levels of functioning and disability showed that more PLCD experienced difficulties taking care of household responsibilities (21.5% PLCD vs. 15.3% PLHIV vs. 12% PLNODX), completing their day-to-day work (13.7% PLCD vs. 6.4% PLHIV vs. 6.8% PLNODX), learning a new task (39.1% PLCD vs. 23.4% PLHIV vs. 20.6% PLNODX), joining in community activities (21.9% PLCD vs. 13.2% PLHIV vs. 9.2% PLNODX) and concentrating (22.7% PLCD vs. 14.1% PLHIV vs. 15.6% PLNODX). In addition, PLCD were most likely to identify that being emotionally affected by their condition was a difficulty in itself (23.8% PLCD vs. 17.0% PLHIV vs. 11.7% PLNODX).

Data were combined using the World Health Organization Disability Assessment Schedule (WHODAS) to create a composite index. Three versions of WHODAS 2.0 were developed, and all query difficulties in the following six selected functional domains during the 30 days preceding the interview:

- Domain 1: Cognition – Assesses communication and thinking activities; specific areas assessed include concentrating, remembering, problem solving, learning and communicating.

- Domain 2: Mobility – Assesses activities such as standing, moving around inside the home, getting out of the home and walking a long distance.

- Domain 3: Self-care – Assesses hygiene, dressing, eating and staying alone.

- Domain 4: Getting along – Assesses interactions with other people and difficulties that might be encountered with this life domain due to a health condition; in this context, “other people” includes those known intimately or well (e.g. spouse or partner, family members or close friends) and those not known well (e.g. strangers).

- Domain 5: Life activities – Assesses difficulty with day-to-day activities (i.e. those that people do on most days, including those associated with domestic responsibilities, leisure, work and school).

- Domain 6: Participation – Assesses social dimensions, such as community activities; barriers and hindrances in the world around the respondent; and problems with other issues, such as maintaining personal dignity. The questions do not necessarily and solely refer to the International Classification of Functioning, Disability and Health (ICF) participation component as such, but also include various contextual (personal and environmental) factors affected by the health condition of the respondent.

This survey utilised the 12-item version of WHODAS 2.0.

This index also showed that there was no statistically significant difference between the scores of the different population groups.

Further questions were asked to PLHIV, PLCD and PLNODX in order to determine levels of disability and functioning. When respondents were asked about how many days in the past 30 days, difficulties\textsuperscript{22} were present, PLHIV had the highest levels of difficulty in the past 30 days (4.34 days out of 30) measured as increased effort, discomfort, pain or slowness or changes in the way activities were done. This compares to 3.87 days for PLCD and 2.39 days for PLNODX. PLCD were unable to carry out their usual activities or work because of their health condition for 3.05 days in the last month, followed by PLHIV (2.50) and PLNODX (1.107). PLCD also cut back or reduced their usual activities or work because of a health condition for more days (2.74 days) than PLHIV (2.18) and PLNODX (1.26).

\textsuperscript{22} Difficulties refers to increased effort while doing activities, discomfort or pain while doing activities, slowness while doing activities, or changes in the way activities are done.
CHAPTER 9
IMPACT OF HIV:
SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- All of the widows surveyed in NA-HHs and HIV-HHs are female due to an increased likelihood for widows to be females.
- Widowed HoHs are seen more commonly in HIV-HHs than in NA-HHs.
- Widows in HIV-HHs were less likely to receive their deceased husband’s assets than widows in NA-HHs.
- HIV-HHs were much more likely to have migrated in the previous five years (34.2%) compared to NA-HHs (23.1%).
- The majority of HIV-HH moved to a different village within the same township (34.9%).
- HIV-HHs were more likely to report migrating because they had been evicted, and in order to seek medical treatment than NA-HHs.
- HIV-affected households cited the need to seek medical treatment as responsible for 7.2% of moves, while non-affected households stated this reason for only 2.1% of moves.
- HIV-affected households gave discrimination as a reason for migration more often than non-affected households (1.9% vs. 0.7%).

9.1. IMPACT OF HIV ON WIDOWS

Widows appear to be particularly vulnerable to negative socio-economic impacts and especially those living with HIV or whose deceased spouse was HIV positive. In Cambodia, for example, widows in HIV-HHs are more often denied access to their deceased husband’s assets than those in NA-HHs (15% vs. 9% respectively) (UNDP, 2011). In Vietnam, 33% of HIV positive widows were asked to leave the household after their husband’s death, and 62% were denied a share in their husband’s property (UNDP, 2009b). In India, 79% of widows living with HIV were denied a share in their late husband’s property and assets (UNDP, 2011), and widow-headed households had much lower household incomes (UNDP, 2006).

This section focuses on two comparisons: (i) HIV-HHs headed and not headed by a widow; (ii) widows in HIV-HHs and NA-HHs with regards to property transfer rights.

All respondents who had lost a spouse were widows (females) as opposed to other studies in the region where a minority of participants were widowers (male). For example, in Cambodia 4% of male-headed households were widowers (UNDP, 2011). Presumably in most instances men contract HIV first and transmit HIV to their wives later on. More HIV-HHs were headed by women than NA-HHs (20.3% vs. 13.2%).
Figure 95: Impact of HIV on Widow Property Transfer Rights

Figure 96: Impact of HIV on Household Migration

The late husband was reported to have a chronic disease in over half of HIV-HHs (57.6%) compared with 44.7% in NA-HHs. In HIV-HHs, 56.5% of late husbands were said to have HIV, and 6.0% cancer. In NA-HHs, deceased spouses suffered from liver disease (18.0%), cancer (17.3%) and hypertension (15.8%).

9.1.2 Impact of HIV on Property Transfer Rights of Widows

In other regional studies, the particular plight of HIV positive widows has been discussed with regards to the discrimination that exists in relation to property transfer rights. Results from the study show that many women in HIV-HHs fail to receive their late husband’s assets upon becoming a widow. In most households the late husband had no assets to pass on to family (66.9% of HIV-HHs vs. 61.0% of NA-HH’s). In HIV-HHs, 23.3% of widows received their husband’s assets compared to 30.4% in NA-HHs (Figure 95). If the widow does not receive the assets, they can be given to the spouse’s children (4.2% of HIV-HH’s vs. 5.4% of NA-HH’s), the spouse’s family (5.3% of HIV-HH’s vs. 2.9% of NA-HH’s), or others (0.4% of HIV-HH’s vs. 0.3% of NA-HH’s).

9.2. IMPACT OF HIV ON MIGRATION

One of the more disruptive household-level impacts of HIV is migration – sometimes entire families are forced to move due to stigma and discrimination against a family member with HIV. In China and India, 58% and 29% of HIV-affected households respectively stated stigma as their reason for recent migration. In Cambodia, HIV-HHs were almost twice as likely as NA-HHs to report that they had migrated in the past five years (28% vs. 15%) (UNDP, 2011b). In Myanmar, 34.2% of HIV-affected households reported moving in the previous five years compared to only 23.1% of NA-HHs. Migration was more common for urban HIV-HHs whereas more rural NA-HHs made a recent move (Figure 96).

While there was no difference between HIV-HHs and NA-HHs in the mean number of moves in the past five years (1.9), NA-HHs predominantly moved within the same village (44.6%) and HIV-HHs moved to a different village within the same township (34.9%) (Figure 97).

The prime reason for both HIV-HHs and NA-HHs to migrate was to look for work (23.8% and 28.3% respectively) (Figure 98). “Eviction” was the second most common reason for HIV-HHs (19.4%), and was higher than reported by NA-HHs (11.7%). The need for medical treatment was responsible for 7.2% of moves for HIV-HHs but only 2.1% for NA-HHs. This may indicate where people face challenges in accessing services as well as pointing to a need for effective referral processes to maintain care between ART clinics. More HIV-HHs said they migrated because
Figure 97: Migration Destination

- HIV-HH:
  - Different state/region within Myanmar: 8.9%
  - Different district same state/region: 7.6%
  - Different township same district: 8.4%
  - Different village same district: 6.8%
  - Within the same village: 6.8%

- NA-HH:
  - Different state/region within Myanmar: 17.1%
  - Different district same state/region: 12.5%
  - Different township same district: 32.5%
  - Different village same district: 15.2%
  - Within the same village: 34.9%

- Total:
  - Different state/region within Myanmar: 29.1%
  - Different district same state/region: 44.6%
  - Different township same district: 32.5%
  - Different village same district: 37.3%
  - Within the same village: 32.3%

Figure 98: Reason for Migration

- HIV-HH:
  - Other: 15.2%
  - Eviction: 17.6%
  - Conflict: 17.6%
  - To be closer to family members: 19.2%
  - Sold property: 16.3%
  - Looking for work: 20.3%

- NA-HH:
  - Other: 23.0%
  - Eviction: 10.6%
  - Conflict: 15.1%
  - To be closer to family members: 12.8%
  - Sold property: 19.4%
  - Looking for work: 11.7%

- Urban:
  - Other: 8.7%
  - Eviction: 12.1%
  - Conflict: 12.1%
  - To be closer to family members: 4.7%
  - Sold property: 10.3%
  - Looking for work: 8.3%

- Rural:
  - Other: 10.4%
  - Eviction: 14.9%
  - Conflict: 19.6%
  - To be closer to family members: 22.8%
  - Sold property: 14.7%
  - Looking for work: 19.0%

- All Households:
  - Other: 17.4%
  - Eviction: 16.3%
  - Conflict: 13.1%
  - To be closer to family members: 8.1%
  - Sold property: 15.4%
  - Looking for work: 12.1%
they sold their property (15.4% vs. 12.1%), and “conflict” led to moves for 10.3% of HIV-HHs and 8.3% of NA-HHs. HIV-HHs said that discrimination forced them to move more often than did NA-HHs (1.9% vs. 0.7%).

Urban HIV-HHs had the highest levels of eviction and selling property, which may relate to higher costs and lower home ownership in cities and towns (see section 3). Discrimination was more common in urban areas whereas conflict was more a problem in rural areas among HIV-HHs (Figure 98). The opposite pattern was observed for NA-HHs more urban than rural households migrated because of conflict.
CHAPTER 10
KNOWLEDGE & AWARENESS OF HIV

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- Levels of knowledge of HIV were high for both HIV-HHs and NA-HHs
- 99.0% of survey respondents from HIV-HHs reported being tested for HIV, while only 51.4% of respondents from NA-HHs had been tested
- 80% of HIV-HHs were aware of a location where they could be tested for HIV compared to only 55.2% of NA-HHs
- HIV-HHs were much more likely to have received their testing from INGO’s/NGO’s compared to NA-HHs
- A much greater percentage of people in richer quintiles from NA-HHs had been tested for HIV compared to those in poorer quintiles, however no difference existed in testing behaviour for HIV-HHs based on wealth
- A high number of respondents indicated that they did not know that HIV is a preventable disease (10% in affected households; 39% in non-affected)
- Knowledge of condom use as a method of prevention was quite low, with 79.0% of people in HIV-HHs being aware of condoms as a prevention method, and only 41.5% awareness in NA-HHs. Notable gender differences existed, with lower levels of knowledge seen in females.
- 13.2% of people living in HIV-HHs, and 41.2% of people in NA-HHs did not know that the disease could be transmitted through unprotected sex, with lower levels of knowledge seen in females
- 71.3% of people in HIV-HHs and 92.8% of people in NA-HHs were not aware that HIV could be transmitted through mother-to-child transmission (MTCT)

Analysing levels of HIV awareness and understanding is important when determining the best policies and programs to reduce transmission, improve treatment and prevention, care and support services, and address stigma and discrimination. Almost all survey respondents had heard of HIV (99.2% HIV-HHs; 93.8% NA-HHs). However, overall a surprisingly high number of respondents did not know that HIV is a preventable disease (10% in HIV-HHs; 39% in NA-HHs). Low proportions of people knew the following methods of prevention (Figure 99): abstaining from sex (25.7% HIV-HHs; 24.9% NA-HHs); avoiding contaminated needles (37.3% HIV-HHs; 24.5% NA-HHs); limiting sexual encounters to one partner (9.3% HIV-HHs; 8.8% NA-HHs). Importantly, knowledge that condoms could prevent HIV transmission was not universal among people in HIV-HHs (78.9%) and known by less than half of those in NA-HHs (41.7%). Awareness was much lower among women compared to men (HIV-HHs: 82.0% of males vs. 72.7% of females; NA-HHs: 43.6% vs. 35.7%) and improved across both household types with increasing wealth. 4.4% of residents of HIV-HHs did not know even one way to prevent HIV and 22.5% of people in NA-HHs.

That compares to earlier national data from the Ministry of National Planning and Economic Development (2011) which found that 95.4% of women had heard of HIV, yet only 45% of these women knew that HIV could be prevented by “having only one faithful uninfected partner, using a condom, and abstaining from sex”.

In this survey, in HIV-HHs, 13.2% of members did not know that HIV could be transmitted through unprotected sex (11.64% male and 16.6% female). In NA-HHs, this figure was a staggering 41.2% (38.4% male and 49.3% female). NA-HHs also demonstrated different levels of knowledge by wealth: only 44.7% of people in Quintile 1 were aware that unprotected sex could transmit HIV vs. 70.7% in the wealthiest Quintile 5.

Most respondents did not know that HIV could be transmitted from mother to child (HIV-HHs: 71.3% vs. NA-HHs: 92.8%). In HIV-HHs, 73.0% of men and 68.1% of women were not aware of MTCT of HIV, and in NA-HHs the proportions were 91.8% and 95.9%. Knowledge of blood transfusion as means of HIV transmission was higher but far from general knowledge and again much lower for NA-HHs (48.6% for HIV-HHs and 68.6% for NA-HHs). Only a minority of respondents recognised that items with blood on them could transmit HIV (28.1% for HIV-HHs and 46.0% for NA-HHs).

As expected, reports of being tested for HIV differed substantially by household: 99.0% of respondents in HIV-HHs had been tested compared with 51.4% NA-HHs. Residents of both household types sourced testing from public and NGO services, although NA-HHs made significantly greater use of private services and less use of NGO services.

For HIV-HHs, there was little difference in testing based on the gender of the HoH; however, in NA-HHs male-headed households were more frequently tested than female-headed HHs (55.3% and 39.8% respectively) (Figure 101). Additionally, there were slight differences between testing in urban and rural households. A much greater proportion of people in the richer quintiles from NA-HHs had been tested compared to those in poorer quintiles (63.7% in Q5; 42.0% NA-HHs) (Figure 102). These differences may be due to differences in access to facilities, as well as differences in knowledge.

The levels of testing among NA-HHs in this survey are considerably higher than national data previously reported: only 33% of women in urban areas and 10.5% in rural areas (17.6% overall) reported testing in 2011 (Ministry of National Planning and Economic Development, 2011).

Awareness of where to get tested, however, might be lower in this study population than reported by earlier studies. The Ministry of National Planning and Economic Development (2011) documented that 70.6% of women were aware of where they can be tested for HIV with knowledge better in urban (82.6%) rather than rural areas (65.3%). For poorer women the figure was 50.7% (with 5.9% tested), and for the richest households it was 84% (with 33% receiving testing). In this study, 80% of HIV-HHs were aware of a testing site but just 55.2% of NA-HHs knew where to go to be tested. When stratified by quintiles of wealth, awareness of testing sites was 49.6% for Q1 and 59.2% for Q5 (Figure 104).

A smaller percentage of people in Quintile 5 reported being tested through an INGO/NGO compared to those in in Quintile 1 (41.1% vs. 24.1% respectively), while private testing increased with increasing wealth (11.3% in Q1 and 26.4% in Q5).
CHAPTER 11
POLICY CONCLUSIONS

The scope of services for PLHIV should be expanded to ensure integrated social protection strategies address the myriad challenges of HIV-affected households. In this regard, based on the findings in the previous chapters, the study points to the areas that need to be further addressed through HIV sensitive strategies.

The main recommendations are:

- Use key study findings to strengthen the equity and effectiveness of national social protection efforts including universal health coverage.

- Integrate targeted HIV impact mitigation programming into “HIV Sensitive” social protection strategies: poverty reduction and income subsidy approaches.

- The National Strategic Plan for HIV should include lifestyle issues related to chronic diseases and alcohol and tobacco cessation strategies as well as incorporating chronic disease prevention and management programmes into the care management for PLHIV.

- Develop targeted interventions to address negative self-esteem and psychosocial challenges faced by PLHIV and their family members.

- Adherence strategies should take into account the broader social risks, e.g. alcoholism, and develop “predictive” models toward case management.

- Ensure asset protection strategies for widows through legal and support strategies.

- Develop targeted policies for boys aimed at reducing human capital ‘wastage’ – for example, conditional cash transfers might be targeted to boy’s permanence in school.
Many of the current interventions for PLHIV are focused on basic prevention or ART treatment. The study shows the full range of challenges for PLHIV extends well beyond the biological aspects and requires greater depth in the care provided.

The main changes proposed are:

☐ Accelerate community-based rapid testing and self-testing to further strengthen decentralization of HCT.

☐ Increase the use of community health workers to provide a higher level of social care for PLHIV, as well as increasing the reach of the health system to increase testing, counselling and adherence for ART.

☐ Increase activities for knowledge awareness of HIV, prevention and testing, as well as programmes to reduce the stigma of HIV.

☐ Develop targeted approaches to address the challenges of the poorest households in everything from knowledge and awareness to risk mitigation strategies.

☐ Increase emergency food support to all HIV-affected households, with special attention to female-headed HIV-HHs and low-income households. Integrate with social protection measures.

☐ Strengthen mental health and psychosocial support services for PLHIV and PLCD. Training for social workers to diagnose and address basic mental health issues with basic checklist approaches or even the use of technology.

☐ Improved legal protection strategies including legal literacy and access to justice for PLHIV to mitigate the study’s result showing high eviction rates for HIV-HHs.

☐ Strengthen TB/HIV minimum package to improve coverage.

☐ Expand standardized and online reporting tools to and improve real-time analysis of data from ART and HCT at decentralized sites.
The ambitious goals of the UNAIDS 90/90/90 strategy will require changes in the Breadth of Services offered to the population.

The main recommendations to support this are:

- Support the scale up of ART coverage to achieve the goal of 90 percent ART coverage and the goal of 90 percent viral suppression by 2020.

- Scale up HIV counselling and testing (HCT) services with focus on increasing yield (e.g. positives/100 tests) in support of the goal of 90 percent awareness among PLHIV regarding their HIV status.

- Build more flexibility into HCT services and create demand for early testing, especially amongst lower income more vulnerable populations.

- Expand the definition of vulnerable groups in the Social Protection Strategy to include PLHIV specifically.

- Increase the coverage of chronic disease management programmes for PLHIV and access to the necessary diagnostic, medicines and care to minimise disability.

- Strengthen HIV education, along with targeted behavioural and mass communications to “normalize” condom use and increase HCT usage.

- Strengthen coordination with the private sector to maximize inclusion of the population that seeks HCT and other services in the private sector.

- PLHIV networks must be technically and financially supported and fit for purpose and effectively managed to deliver strategic results for the PLHIV community.
REFERENCES

American Heart Association (2015). HIV and Cardiovascular Disease (Heart Disease). Available at: http://www.heart.org/HEARTORG/Conditions/More/HIVandYourHeart/HIV-and-Cardiovascular-Disease-Heart-Disease_UCM_315419_Article.jsp

Australian Federation of AIDS Organisations. THE IMPORTANCE OF GIVING UP SMOKING FOR PEOPLE WITH HIV, 2009

UNDP. (2011b). The Socio-Economic Impact of HIV at the Household Level in Asia: A Regional Analysis.

THE SOCIOECONOMIC IMPACT OF PEOPLE LIVING WITH HIV AT THE HOUSEHOLD LEVEL IN MYANMAR
EXHIBIT 9
INTRODUCTION

Stigma and discrimination, violence and punitive legal and social environments are key determinants of increased HIV and other STI risk and vulnerability among sex workers.¹, ², ³, ⁴, ⁵ In Asia, the risk of HIV is 29 times greater for female sex workers (FSW) than for women of a similar age who are not sex workers.⁶

In Myanmar, unprotected sexual intercourse with females who sell sex accounts for almost one third (32%) of new infections.⁷ In 2015, the Integrated Biological and Behavioral Surveillance (IBBS) survey conducted in a representative sample of the population, showed a particularly high prevalence of HIV among FSW in specific areas. In Yangon, one quarter of FSW who participated in the survey tested HIV-positive, 14% in Mandalay, 11% in Pathein and Pyay.

The national HIV prevalence among FSW based on HIV Sentinel Surveillance (HSS) and IBBS data input into Asian Epidemic Model (AEM) is estimated at 14.6% in 2015, almost 25 times greater than among the general population.⁸

CHALLENGES

Punitive legal framework in Myanmar is a major obstacle to scaling up HIV and other health services and leads to treatment disruption for sex workers.

Recommendations have been put forward for legal review and amendment of the Suppression of Prostitution Act 1949.⁹ Sex workers are arrested under various sections of this Act including Section 7, which can bring charges against women who are “suspected of prostitution” due to reputation. Sex workers are also commonly charged with “loitering after dark” pertaining to Section 35 of the Police Act 1945, and Section 30 of the Rangoon Police Act 1899.¹⁰
Implementing partners and sex worker networks report that sex workers are oftentimes arrested when they are not working or even after they have left the sex industry. Incarceration can cause sex workers living with HIV to default from antiretroviral therapy programmes, which can result in drug resistance, treatment failure and the progression to advanced HIV infection or AIDS, which will become a burden to the individuals, their families, the health system and the country. Sex workers may be the sole income earner for their family, and incarceration prevents them from providing for, or taking care of, dependent family members. Incarceration also precludes sex workers from participating in peer-lead HIV prevention efforts. Their involvement is essential to the success of the HIV response.

Stigma and discrimination affects sex workers’ ability to protect themselves against HIV.

Criminalisation of sex work worsens stigma and discrimination experienced by sex workers. Stigma and discrimination can have a profound effect on an individual’s confidence, sense of self-worth and capacity. This can impact on sex workers’ ability to successfully negotiate condom use. It can also be a barrier to accessing health and social services, as well as seeking legal protections and remedies for rights violations such as physical violence.

Law enforcement activities and police arrest quotas present barriers to HIV prevention, treatment and care among sex workers.

Implementing partners and sex worker networks report police-related violence and abuse of sex workers, and express concerns that law enforcement activities deter sex workers from accessing HIV services. These law enforcement activities include “crackdowns” to fulfil arrest quotas. This can sometimes include the arrest of peer educators and outreach workers, and result in the disruption of HIV and STI prevention services, including condom distribution. In light of the important role of condoms in HIV prevention, this can have serious consequences, not only for sex workers but for the overall public health response to HIV and other STIs.

Condoms are still used as proof of sex work, despite the Administrative Order issued in 2000 by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

An Administrative Order issued by the Ministry of Home Affairs in 2000, directs police not to use condoms as evidence to prosecute sex workers, it is reported that this practise still occurs at the local level, including confiscation of condoms from sex workers. Reportedly, police have sometimes used peer education meetings as opportunities to identify sex work venues and subsequently arrest sex workers. As a result, many establishments refuse entry to peer educators and outreach workers. Such police conduct is an ongoing problem in Myanmar as it deters sex workers from carrying condoms, placing them at risk of HIV, STIs and unintended pregnancy. It also undermines the significant investments made by the Government of Myanmar towards halting and reversing the HIV epidemic.

Sex workers lack access to adequate legal services.

Of great concern is the fact that sex workers in Myanmar currently have no protection or safe mechanism to report acts of violence or abuse, particularly if the perpetrator is a police officer. The legal service providers that do exist, such as Myanmar Equality and Myanmar Law Project, have limited coverage (Yangon and Mandalay) and human resource capacity. Legal provisions scheduled to be developed in 2015, such as the Prevention of Violence against Women Law and the Legal Aid Provision Bill, will facilitate increased access to legal services among women and key populations. Access to legal services and representation for female, male and transgender sex workers remains integral to an effective HIV response.
ACTIONS

Reform existing laws such as the Suppression of Prostitution Act (1949) and establish new regulations to protect sex workers from violence, stigma and discrimination. The involvement of sex worker communities in advocacy efforts is essential. Reform efforts should consider international evidence supporting the benefits of alternative legislative approaches to sex work, including models of public health and safety regulation and the protection of human rights of sex workers. Amendments to the existing laws or the drafting of a new law on sex work should take into consideration recommendations outlined in the National HIV Legal Review Report (2014).¹⁸

In a joint letter sent to the Ministry of Home Affairs (dated 19 August 2015) responding to a call for public comments to the draft amendments of the Suppression of Prostitution Act of 1949, the members of the United Nations Gender Theme Group in Myanmar (UNAIDS, UNDP, UNESCO, UNFPA, UN Women, and ILO), recommended taking a comprehensive approach towards improving health and human rights of sex workers in line with international policy documents, declarations, commitments, and guidelines.

Other specific laws for review should include: Section 268 of the Penal Code 1860 (public nuisance), Section 54 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (arrest without warrant), Section 34(7) of the Police Act (causing disorder by drunkenness), and Section 377 of the Penal Code 1860 which impacts on male and transgender sex workers (carnal intercourse against the order of nature).

Develop appropriate legal services and protection options for sex workers in order to end impunity and the denial of sex workers' right to justice. Increased funding for legal aid programmes and pro bono legal services as well as, a hotline number, for key populations, including sex workers, should be made available.

Endorse and reinforce the Ministry of Home Affairs Administrative Order (of 2000) not to use condoms as evidence of sex work, at all levels. This Order should be updated and reissued by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Strengthen the capacity of local operational police, judiciary and other law enforcement agencies to effectively respond to victims and survivors of sexual violence and to undertake investigations by enhancing their training to include topics on gender-based violence, reproductive health and HIV. This will also encourage sex workers to report crimes committed against them without fear or threat of arrest. A systematic monitoring system should be developed and implemented to ensure all allegations and reports of violence against sex workers, including those perpetrated by police and other state officials, are promptly and impartially investigated. More female police officers should be recruited and trained to better meet the needs of sex workers and respond to their complaints.

End impunity and the denial of sex workers' right to justice and redress. Impose penalties and disciplinary measures to those carrying out violence against sex workers.

Provide training for operational police on how best to support HIV and STI programming for sex workers and their clients. Such training should emphasise the public health goals of interventions among sex workers and the importance of peer educators and outreach workers in the HIV response. Central to this training should be the introduction of a system that recognises the good work undertaken by police who support HIV and STI prevention programming. Further, tailored training should be provided to police and prison staff to ensure incarcerated sex workers are treated with dignity and respect, and those living with HIV have adequate access to appropriate health services, including uninterrupted access to antiretroviral therapy, and screening, diagnosis and treatment of opportunistic infections. These trainings would be best provided by law enforcement officers with experience and expertise in this area. Focusing on female police officers, as trainers and trainees, will help with outreach to FSW.

Updated in March 2017
Highlight examples of good policy and practice undertaken by police in support of HIV prevention, treatment and care among sex workers and disseminate these examples to law enforcement and other organisations working on sex work issues in Myanmar. In addition, local “health support liaison officers” should be established whenever possible, to serve as focal points for all sex work-related law enforcement issues, and to provide guidance and direction to fellow officers on best practices in law enforcement responses to communities vulnerable to HIV. The mandate of the health support liaison officer should be to support key populations by protecting them from violence and rights violations and ensuring access to health services and tools, including condoms.

Remove sex workers (female, male, and transgender) from the arrest quotas as a method to appraise police performance and develop a system that reframes police performance monitoring frameworks to strengthen attention and institutional support for the protective role that police can play in promoting public health including the safety and rights of sex workers. Such a framework may include formal recognition of the good work undertaken by police who provide support for HIV and STI prevention programmes among sex workers.

Hold regular forums among cross-sector stakeholders at the local level to address and resolve issues related to sex work, and build more effective working relationships between police, government, sex workers and service providers from public, private and non-government sectors.

---

References

9. The National HIV Legal Review Report was released in September 2014. Meetings with government, United Nations and implementing partners and other stakeholders in a Joint Committee were held in May 2014 to identify priorities pertaining to HIV and the law for key populations. Six ‘quick wins’ were determined at this meeting: i) develop new police instructions to support specific HIV interventions for key populations; ii) develop new guidance on HIV-related discrimination and confidentiality in key sectors; iii) develop guidance on universal ART access; iv) develop guidance on pregnancy rights of HIV-positive women; v) repeal sections of the Burma Excise Act 1917 that criminalize possession of needles and syringes for injecting drugs; and vi) ensure the Patents Bill will enable Myanmar to continue to access affordable generic medicines. Medium term priorities include the review and reform for the Suppression of Prostitution Act (1949). For more information, refer to the HIV Legal Review Report (2014), p.32 and p.43.
10. Ibid
12. Ibid.
17. Ibid.
18. Ibid.
‘Treat us like human beings’ – Life story of a woman who uses drugs in Myanmar

07 December 2020
Article

This commentary is part of the ten-day global campaign to end violence against women, in which the Drug Policy Advocacy Group – Myanmar (DPAG) also participates together with partners in Myanmar, including female sex workers, women living with HIV, and transgender people. DPAG’s campaign focuses on ending violence against women, including women who use drugs and other women facing intersecting inequalities. The campaign is coordinated by DPAG, and supported by the Sex Worker Network in Myanmar (SWIM), Myanmar Positive Women Network, Myanmar Youth Stars, and the Transnational Institute (TNI). For more information see DPAG’s Facebook page.

Programmes
Myanmar in Focus, Drugs & Democracy

Photo credit Dah Eh

Introduction

Zarli Aye Kyaw is a woman who uses drugs from Yangon. She spent over four years in prison for being arrested in September 2014 for drugs use related issues. Zarli was originally sentenced to ten years, but was released in May 2019 following a mass Presidential Amnesty. Jail sentences prescribed by Myanmar drug laws are very lengthy, including for minor offences such as drug use and possession for personal use. The country's prisons have problematic living conditions and are overcrowded. Access to health care in prisons remains challenging and often dependent on prisoners' ability to pay bribes. Zarli below relates her life experience and the time she spent in Insein prison, the country's largest and most infamous detention facility. Over the years, she worked as a peer educator on HIV related issues for a drug user network in Myanmar. She continued similar activities while incarcerated in prison.

A Commentary by Zarli Aye Kyaw
Hello everyone!

Everyone has a dream when they are young. My dream was to be a doctor. When I was in school, I was excellent at sports and I was also part of the selection of school sprint running team. However, my destiny changed, as I was forced to quit from school because I took part in political protests by students during 1988-1989. It was the start of ruining my life.

As I had a lot of free time, I started having a lot of friends and going to parties and nightclubs. I felt so proud to drink whiskey and smoke cigarettes, and then later also started using heroin, which we called ‘No.4’. At first I snorted heroin, and later on I started to inject it. At first, I used it just for fun and to try something new, and I was doing fine when I was not using it. Later, I started using it more frequently with my friends whenever we were having a good time or a bad time. At that stage, I really liked it.

When I became addicted to heroin, my life was torn apart, and I got HIV infected at that time. I felt my life was ruined, and I felt more and more disappointed at myself. Taking a daily dose of antiretroviral therapy (ART) for treatment of HIV for such a long time also made me feel terrible. At that stage, I was using heroin again and again, and then I was caught. When I was arrested, I was on methadone treatment, which is a substitute for heroin. I was arrested on Sunday 6 September 2014. Two days later, I was transferred from the Bahan Township Court to Insein Jail. I asked them if they could let me stay in custody at the police station for one month, but I found out that this could only be possible by bribing the police station officer. I did not have enough time to find money so I was forced to go to Insein jail in the blue colored prison car.

At that time, the head doctor from the Drug Dependency Unit of the Ywar Thar Gyi Mental Health Hospital called my brother, and said “my patient will be in trouble, you should come and take methadone for her”. He said this fully with love and compassion as a doctor. So my brother went to Ywar Thar Gyi to pick up methadone for me. The next day, my brother came to Insein Jail to visit me, and for the first time gave methadone to me in the women jail legally. It was because of the doctor’s signature and his compassionate effort for his patients to provide methadone at every possible place. It is really necessary to have such kind of doctors for us drug users. Because of the compassion of the staff, I could stay at the women hospital in Insein Jail for one month for free [without paying a bribe] and tailed off methadone, and got some necessary treatment for this. After that, I got discharged and was readmitted again in jail by the prison warden. Whenever I could meet with a medical staff who saw me as a patient to take care of, I could go to hospital for one more month again. When I was in the Insein Jail, although I was under custody care because I was not sentenced yet, most of the staff there treated me like a prisoner. I was discharged from the prison hospital and readmitted to jail again and again.
Then on 13 August 2015, I was sentenced to prison for ten years; six years for the charge of possession of narcotic drugs in hand, and another four years for the urine test being positive. But it could have been even longer, because Dr. Soe Naing from Alliance Myanmar came to the court and spoke out for me, and my sentence was reduced. I could have been sentenced for ten years for possession of narcotic drug under section 16/C of the law, and for another five years under section 15 of the law for the positive urine test. So the total sentence could have been fifteen years. But Dr. Soe Naing testified in court for me, and he said to the judge: “she was a drug user, but she helped a lot in social welfare activities with us. Also, her health is in bad shape. She is HIV positive and also has Hepatitis C. I really respect the law but please lower her sentence”. Because of that, I was sentenced for only ten years.
Zarli Aye Kyaw wearing a Support Don't Punish mask / Photo credit Dah Eh
As I became a prisoner, I had to carry out some prison work, and at that time the head of the prison asked to meet me. I requested him to give me only some medical job related to HIV, and I showed him training certificates I obtained from UNODC, the Burnet Institute, and the Myanmar Anti-Narcotics Association. Without having to pay a bribe, I became a peer health care provider in prison. But then the prison warden asked me to take a break for one month from this activity. Every day after taking a bath, I went to the warden's office to plea to get my job back, but I did not had a chance to meet her a single time. Every time they gave me different kinds of reasons. “Ma Ma Gyi (the warden) is ill, Ma Ma Gyi’s mom is ill, Ma Ma Gyi is angry, Ma Ma Gyi is in a bad mood”, and more like that. These experiences in jail that I got were only because of money. It was because I could not pay any bribe. After facing a lot of problems and started working as peer health care provider for the fellow-sufferer who are HIV positive, I felt inferior among the prisoners who lived at the hospital and acted as other health care providers [not working on HIV]. These prisoners also paid a bribe to become a health care provider in jail.

In the women’s hospital, there were no sufficient medicines to treat opportunistic infections related to HIV. There was no paracetamol and no vitamins, but you could get antibiotics. But most of the medicines were out of stock, so I had to please and plea with the prison medical staff to get medicines to treat opportunistic infections. As a peer health care provider, I needed to have stationary, such as pens and paper, and some medication like paracetamol. I could not buy these because I did not have money, but some of my peers helped me to get some medicines. Also some helped me to buy stationary, and one of the nurses from the hospital gave me a blood pressure monitor as a present.

As a peer health care provider, I got a lot of experiences. The worst case was with the lady with one star [a second lieutenant prison medical officer]. One of my peers’ CD4 count was under 350, but the prison doctor did not give her ART yet, so I asked why and she said because of the kidney status. This was true, as the patient’s body was already swollen. When the patient was hospitalized, the lady with one star wrongly gave that patient ART, whereas the doctor had earlier suggested giving Septrin, as prevention for opportunistic infection, and not ART. I conducted counseling sessions with that patient several times about ART, and at that time the patient showed me the ART she was taking. When I checked the patient’s medical book, I found out what the doctor had suggested. This is only known because the patient showed me. Also, on another occasion, one of the peer health care providers had a needle prick injury from when she took care of a pregnant woman with HIV, so the peer was afraid to get infected. This peer subsequently received some medication instead of post-exposure prophylaxis treatment [a short course of HIV medicine taken very soon after a possible exposure to HIV]. Therefore I told the peer this is not the medicine you should take. Please consult with the doctor from the National AIDS Program when he comes and visit the jail next time. When this doctor came and checked, I was right, they had given the peer the wrong medicine.
So many mistakes like this happened here and there. I am only sharing these situations in a positive way. The medical staff in jail only treated us as prisoners, but we also are human beings. Even though we are prisoners, as the prison hospital they should treat us as patients. The staff from the women prison hospital also should have HIV knowledge and training. And there also should be sufficient and proper medicines. “You guys have done whatever you wanted outside, but now you are scared to die and come to the clinic again and again” were the bitter words we heard from the prison medical staff. But whatever we have done outside, in the prison hospital they need to see us patients and treat us without error and provide full medical services.

Now I feel worried for my peers who are left behind in the prison, but there is nothing I can do for them. This why I would like to request the Ministry of Health and Sports to take care of prisoners who have HIV and also other prisoners with health problems, and provide them with necessary medical treatment. We drug users we have addition problems and are patients, and not criminals. Drug addiction is not a serious offence like treason, it is not a like a big crime. I am asking the leaders of the nation to please stop putting us in jail with heavy sentences, and please send us to drug treatment centers and rehabilitation camps. We drug users also have our own strengths and skills, and we would like to use these skills to help building up the nation. We want to be a part of it. Please see us as human beings. We want to become a good citizen and we want to have jobs, and we want to have a full life as other people. I do not want to live and die under stigmatizing words such as ‘addict’, ‘HIV positive’, or ‘ex-prisoner’. I do not want to waste my life under these stigmatizing words. I want to live my life fully. This is the message I would like to give to the head of state.

“We drug users also have our own strengths and skills, and we would like to use these skills to help building up the nation. We want to be a part of it.”

Zarli Aye Kyaw

Straight to...

Finances
Annual Reports
Strategic Plan
Media Review
Vacancies

EXHIBIT 11
HIV and AIDS in Myanmar

KEY POINTS

- Although sustained and focused efforts to reach key populations have led to major reductions in HIV infections between 2010 and 2017, Myanmar continues to display a high incidence of new HIV infections.

- People who inject drugs are the group most affected by HIV in Myanmar. This is largely due to the endemic use of drugs, which are farmed, manufactured and distributed, in the northern regions of the country.

- Although access to HIV treatment is expanding, the country's low financial investment in public health appears to be a major barrier to the success of HIV programmes.

Explore this page to find out more about populations most affected by HIV in Myanmar, testing and counselling, prevention programmes, antiretroviral treatment availability, civil society’s role, HIV and TB coinfection, barriers to the response, funding and the future of HIV in Myanmar.

Myanmar (2019)

- 240,000 people living with HIV
- 0.7% adult HIV prevalence (ages 15-49)
- 10,000 new HIV infections
- 7,700 AIDS-related deaths
- 77% adults on antiretroviral treatment*
- 73% children on antiretroviral treatment*

*All adults/children living with HIV

Source: UNAIDS Data 2020

Around 240,000 people were living with HIV in Myanmar (Burma) in 2019. In the same year, an estimated 7,700 people died from AIDS-related illnesses. The increased antiretroviral treatment coverage has seen the number of people dying of AIDS-related illnesses fall by a third between 2010-2018. The number of new HIV infections has also fallen by a similar proportion during this time.

After Thailand, Myanmar has the second-highest HIV prevalence in Southeast Asia at 0.7%. Myanmar is one of 35 countries that together account for 90% of new infections globally. The severity of the country’s HIV epidemic resulted in UNAIDS classifying it as a ‘fast-track’ country in 2014 in order to help catalyse the rapid scale-up of its HIV prevention, testing and treatment programmes, although progress in these areas has been uneven.5

In 2018, Myanmar reported 10,000 new infections.6 Although this number remains steady compared to the years before, observations show the annual rate of infections is no longer declining at the same rate it did between 2000 and 2010.7

Although official testing, treatment and viral suppression target data for UNAIDS’ 90-90-90 targets is incomplete, current estimates suggest around 76% of all people living with HIV in Myanmar were on treatment as of 2019. Of those on treatment, 95% are virally suppressed, equivalent to 72% of all people living with HIV.8

Myanmar’s HIV epidemic is concentrated among certain key populations, most notably people who inject drugs (sometimes referred to as PWID), but also men who have sex with men (sometimes referred to as MSM), transgender people and sex workers. More than 70% of new infections in the country each year occur among these groups.9 Approximately 65% of all key populations are estimated to be living in five regions and states (Mandalay, Yangon, Sagaing, Kachin and Shan North), largely in urban areas, which is where the majority of new infections occur.10

Key affected populations in Myanmar

People who inject drugs (PWID)

In 2018, 93,000 people in Myanmar were estimated to inject drugs, 19% of whom were living with HIV. This makes people who inject drugs the population group most affected by HIV in the country.11
Analysis suggests that HIV infection occurs at an early age among people who inject drugs in Myanmar, with 17% of injecting drug users under the age of 25 testing positive. These findings have bolstered the case for developing more youth-targeted programmes.

Although urban areas in Myanmar report the highest HIV prevalence rates in the country, prevalence is also high in the more rural northern and north-eastern areas where injectable opium is produced and its use is endemic. Distribution of drugs from this region has also contributed to new HIV infections developing in more remote areas of the country, providing additional challenges to expanding the coverage of harm reduction and HIV services.

Only around a third (34%) of people who inject drugs have access to HIV prevention programmes. As a result, under a quarter of injecting drug users (22%) are estimated to use condoms and only a third (28%) of people who inject drugs who are HIV positive are aware of their status.

Men who have sex with men (MSM)

In 2018, 6.4% of gay men and other men who have sex with men in Myanmar were estimated to be living with HIV.

Rates are particularly high in cities and urban areas such as Yangon, where HIV prevalence is estimated to be 26.6% among this population group. This the highest recorded prevalence rate for this group in the Southeast Asia region, even higher than Bangkok in Thailand where prevalence is estimated to be 24.4%.

Myanmar’s National Strategic Plan on HIV and AIDS 2016-2020 recognises that these rates are alarming and has presented a plan to scale up targeted services for men who have sex with men in geographical locations where HIV prevalence is high.

Stigma and discrimination continues to contribute to low levels of access to HIV services, with between half and three quarters of men who have sex with men estimated to have taken an HIV test in 2015. Consequently, in 2017, just over half (52.4%) of men who have sex with men who were living with HIV were aware of their status.

Most recent statistics suggest 77% of men who have sex with men use condoms. However, male-to-male sexual dynamics are complex in Myanmar, and risk behaviours can vary between self-categorised groups of men who have sex with men. Although Myanmar has a relatively visible LGBT community, existing laws criminalise same-sex behaviour and keep many people hidden from the reach of healthcare providers. Moreover, a lack of legal gender-identity recognition in the country often results in transgender people being wrongly categorised as men who have sex with men and provided with inappropriate HIV services.

These observations have resulted in the National Strategic Plan including a more appropriate framework for effectively responding to the needs of gay men, men who have sex with men and transgender people. By 2020 the new strategy aims to reach more ‘non-disclosed’ men who have sex with men by expanding services through innovative social media activity, test-and-treat campaigns and proactive community-led outreach, linked to services that are friendly towards gay men, men who have sex with men and transgender people.
Sex workers

In 2018, HIV prevalence among sex workers stood at 5.6%. Around 45% of HIV positive sex workers were aware of their status.24

In Myanmar’s major cities, HIV prevalence among sex workers is much higher, estimated at 24.6% and 13.7% in Yangon and Mandalay respectively, representing some of the highest HIV prevalence locations in the Southeast Asia and Pacific region.25

Sex work is criminalised in Myanmar and so presents a major obstacle to scaling up HIV and other essential healthcare services for this group. Sex worker networks and civil society organisations report police-related violence and abuse towards sex workers, something that deters many sex workers from accessing HIV services, including HIV testing and lifesaving antiretroviral treatment. Incarceration can cause sex workers living with HIV to disrupt treatment, which can result in drug resistance, treatment failure and the progression to advanced HIV infection or AIDS.26

The criminalisation of sex work also worsens stigma and discrimination towards them, which also drives sex workers away from healthcare services.27

Young people

In 2018, young people (aged 15-24 years) accounted for 26% of new infections in the region but a higher proportion in Myanmar at around 55%.28

Because Myanmar’s HIV epidemic is concentrated among certain groups, 15 to 24-year-olds from these key populations are most affected. For example, HIV prevalence among young men who have sex with men is five times that of the general population. Social norms concerning same-sex relationships and the criminalisation of homosexuality, coupled with taboos regarding young people’s sexuality, combine to result in poor access to essential HIV services and information.29

As a result of a lack of access to HIV and sexual health services, young people from key populations are at high risk of acquiring HIV and other STIs. A study with young female sex workers and young men who have sex with men based in Yangon and Mandalay found 30% had a sexually transmitted infection (STI) and around 40% had accessed treatment. Those that sought treatment did so from NGO-run clinics rather than public health facilities as they were seen as more welcoming. Adolescent men who have sex with men and brothel-based young sex workers were found to be the least likely to access any form of sexual health service. 30

Migrants

Myanmar is home to over 100 different ethnic groups and shares its borders with two of the most populated countries in the world, India and China, in addition to Bangladesh, Laos and Thailand.

The last census (2014) estimated that over 11 million residents (approximately 20% of the population) have migrated internally or externally.31 Some critics are concerned that increasingly open borders make Myanmar more vulnerable to HIV incidence with the increase of migrants coming from bordering high-prevalence countries.32

As HIV testing is not a condition for entry, work or residence in Myanmar, there is little comprehensive information available on HIV prevalence or risk behaviours associated with the migrant population. Nevertheless, in 2014, the UN’s International Organization for Migration’s data project found that 18% of people identifying as migrants in Mon and Kayin states were HIV positive – although it is difficult to assess if the point of infection happened within the country.33 However, it is broadly assumed that migrants might face residency and social restrictions that limit their access to HIV programming services, as well as other forms of healthcare.34

Since 2014, HIV awareness campaigns that target large migrant populations have been created to address these issues.35 NSP III proposes developing specific packages for people near transit points in addition to cross-border referral mechanisms and agreements to strengthen access to health services in destination countries.36

Since August 2017 almost a million Rohingya people have migrated to neighbouring Bangladesh, fleeing from mass atrocities in Myanmar, their homeland. Most are now living in the Cox’s Bazar district of Bangladesh where they are particularly vulnerable to HIV and other STIs due to multiple and overlapping forms of discrimination and abuse.37 Sexual violence and exploitation is common and the area is also a drug trafficking route, meaning heroin is widely available, all of which increases people’s vulnerability to HIV. As of March 2019, around 320 in the Cox’s Bazar refugee camp had been diagnosed with HIV and it is likely more people are living with HIV but are undiagnosed. Of those diagnosed, 277 are on treatment and 19 have died.38

HIV testing and counselling (HTC) in Myanmar

There has been no new behavioural data on HIV testing among the general population in Myanmar since 2007 when it was recorded at 11.3%.39 As such, there is an urgent need to strengthen the involvement of community networks in the planning and monitoring of testing services.40

The National Strategic Plan aims to promote early HIV testing and counselling, in line with World Health Organization (WHO) recommendations. It also aims to close the testing gap by prioritising high HIV prevalence areas and decentralising HIV counselling and testing so that it is provided by the local public health sector.41

Current strategies to increase HIV testing include mobile and community-based testing in places where people from key populations can be found, working with people from key populations to become peer educators, who then link other people from their communities to NGO-run testing and treatment services.42 Provider-initiated HIV testing, whereby medical professionals offer HIV testing to patients who they deem to be at risk, has also been integrated into general practices, antenatal clinics and tuberculosis services.43

HIV self-testing is not yet widely available but a self-testing policy is being developed, and a handful of self-testing trials focusing on transgender women and men who have sex with men have been conducted.44

CASE STUDY: Attitudes towards self-testing for out-of-reach key affected populations in Myanmar

A 2017 study by the Johns Hopkins University School of Public Health and the International HIV/AIDS Alliance in Myanmar conducted focus groups and in-depth interviews with transgender women and gay men in Myanmar to examine their attitudes towards HIV self-testing.

The confidentiality and privacy that comes with self-testing for HIV were seen as significant benefits by both groups. People taking part in the study saw self-testing as a way to avoid uncertainty and worry about who will be there when seeking facility-based HIV testing, as it can be done at home. The fact that self-testing is conducted through a saliva-based test and is therefore pain-free was also seen as an advantage.

Although participants were generally optimistic about self-testing some concerns were raised, particularly around the lack of counselling associated with self-testing. They feared this might lead to poor mental health outcomes among those who test positive, which could prevent them from disclosing their status and linking to care.

The fact that self-testing is conducted orally also raised concerns. Participants highlighted how this may lead people to incorrectly believe that saliva can transmit HIV, which could further stigmatise people living with HIV. The use of community education, peer networks, social media and mass media to inform people about self-testing was suggested by participants as a way to combat this.

Concerns around the introduction of compulsory self-testing by employers or others in positions of power, which could result in further stigma, were also raised.45
HIV prevention programmes in Myanmar

Myanmar’s National Strategic Plan sets the target of reaching 90% of sex workers, men who have sex with men, people who inject drugs, prisoners and migrants with combination prevention services by 2020. Unfortunately, current data suggests this target will be missed.46

The strategy sets out a number of key focus areas to reduce new infections:

- expanding combination prevention interventions for priority populations
- maximising HIV testing and linkages to treatment for priority populations
- integrating service delivery into maternal and child health and sexual and reproductive health
- providing pre-exposure prophylaxis (PrEP) for at-risk populations
- working towards the elimination of mother-to-child transmission of HIV.47 A number of these focus areas are examined in more detail below.

Harm reduction

Research consistently shows that harm reduction programmes, such as needle and syringe exchange programmes (NSPs) and opioid substitution therapy, are the most effective way of reducing the spread of HIV among people who inject drugs.48 49

Myanmar has one of the best NSPs in the region, and has increased the number of needle and syringe exchanges available in recent years. In 2018, around 270 NSP sites were operating in the country50, providing an average of 350 clean needles and syringes for every person who injects drugs. As a result, the use of sterile injecting equipment is high, with around 90% of people who inject drugs reporting that they used clean equipment at last injection.51

However, because the scale of drug use in Myanmar is particularly extensive, existing harm reduction services are failing to meet the escalating demand by people who inject drugs.52 In particular, OST sites need to be scaled up. Currently only around 50 OST sites are in operation, reaching around 17% of people who inject drugs.53 54

The government has recognised the need to scale up its commitment to strengthening harm reduction services, allocating an additional US$1 million (as part of the US$11 million domestic funding commitment towards HIV services) for methadone as a form of opioid substitution in 2016.55 However, critics suggest that this sum will not be enough to curtail the growing dependency on drug use within the country.56

People ask us why we are helping people who use drugs, since they think these people are not good. People who use drugs are also human. If we, the community, do not change how we think and our attitudes towards them, our region and our country will not be able to develop.
- Saw Yu Htwe, AIDS Committee member in Kachin state where two out of five people who inject drugs are estimated to be living with HIV.57

Preventing mother-to-child transmission (PMTCT)

HIV counselling and testing services for all pregnant women have been integrated into antenatal services across the country, which presents a much more successful model of implementation compared to other countries within the region.58 59 As a result, 95% of pregnant women took an HIV test in 2018, and 80% of those testing HIV positive accessed treatment.60

Routine monitoring continues to be an area of weakness – as it is across most testing, prevention and treatment services in Myanmar. Only a quarter of infants who had been exposed to HIV were tested within the first six weeks of life (known as early infant diagnosis).61 Myanmar’s National Strategic Plan suggests that there is a critical need for better collaboration between health services to integrate early infant diagnosis into post-birth care, in order to establish a fully comprehensive PMTCT cascade.62

!MYANMAR Elimination of mother-to-child transmission, 2010-2018

Pre-exposure prophylaxis (PrEP)

Although Myanmar has included PrEP in the National Strategic Plan, the country has no PrEP programmes in place.

A 2016 study carried out to test the acceptability of PrEP among men who have sex with men in Myanmar found 39% of participants would be willing to use it, with the cost of PrEP a key barrier to access. The study also suggested that, because sex between men is illegal in Myanmar, it is unlikely that men who have sex with men would access PrEP from government-run clinics.63
Antiretroviral treatment availability (ART) in Myanmar

According to UNAIDS, in 2018 70% of adults and 80% of children living with HIV in Myanmar were on antiretroviral treatment (ART).\(^{64}\) It is worth noting that this figure has more than doubled (from 24%) in 2012, and has seen the country achieve higher treatment coverage than the regional average (54%). As a result, the country has witnessed the number of AIDS-related deaths fall by 30% since 2010, to 7,800 in 2018 as ART coverage has expanded.\(^ {65}\)

Despite men being more affected by HIV than women in the country, HIV positive women in Myanmar are more likely to be on treatment than their male counterparts. In 2018, 81% of all women living with HIV in the country were on treatment, compared to 63% of men.\(^ {66}\) This is largely due to Myanmar’s successful PMTCT programme.

For those on treatment, HIV treatment services are generally of good quality, with 86% of people starting ART still engaged in care after 12 months (as of 2018).\(^ {67}\) Overall, 92% of people on treatment were virally suppressed in 2018, meaning they are likely to be in good health and will be unable to transmit HIV to others. High levels of viral load suppression have particularly been achieved among women.\(^ {68}\) Due to a continued lack of access to testing and treatment for many HIV positive people, this equates to 65% of all people living with HIV in Myanmar being virally suppressed overall.\(^ {69}\)

Nevertheless, despite improvements in treatment access, there is limited availability of viral load testing and HIV drug resistance testing for people on first-line as well as second-line ART.\(^ {70}\)

The testing gap also creates a situation in which many people access treatment at a late stage of infection. For example, a study of around 2,600 people living with HIV in Yangon found 77% began treatment with HIV categorised at WHO stage 3 or 4.\(^ {71}\)

Historically, the majority of healthcare facilities in Myanmar have been privately funded or supported by NGOs. It is also estimated that at least 25% of people in Myanmar live below the poverty line and that those living with HIV may struggle to source the funds for necessary ARV treatment. As such there have been strong arguments for a transition from private and NGO-run services to public sector delivery, with the hope of making treatment more readily available to vulnerable groups across the country.\(^ {72}\)

CASE STUDY: Long-term outcomes of second-line ART in Myanmar

Second-line ART has been available in Myanmar since 2008, however until recently there has been no published data about the outcomes of patients on second-line treatment. A 2017 study followed a cohort of 824 adults and adolescents over seven years in which time 11% of patients died and the overall incidence rate of unfavourable outcomes of those who moved onto second-line treatment was 7.9%.

Those who fared worse on second-line treatment included patients with a history of injecting drug use, those lost to follow-up and those with a higher baseline viral load. Comparatively, patients with higher baseline CD4 counts, those who had taken first-line ART at a private clinic or received ART at decentralised sites all seemed to have a lower risk of unfavourable outcomes.
Though these results indicate relatively good long-term outcomes of patients on second-line ART treatment, there was a strong emphasis on making viral load monitoring routine and third-line ART drugs available for cases of virological failure.73

Civil society’s role and HIV in Myanmar

The legacy of military rule and restrictions on the financing and operations of civil society in Myanmar hinder efforts to provide support to people living with HIV and populations at risk of HIV. In 2018 the government increased its use of the law to arrest and imprison people for peaceful expression deemed critical of the government or military.74

Despite this, civil society continues to grow and is playing an increasingly important part in the country’s HIV response. The Myanmar Positive Group-MPG, a national network of people living with HIV, promotes networking between individuals and self-help groups, works to reduce stigma and discrimination, and advocates for peoples’ rights to access treatment and quality services. In 2015, there were 177 networked self-help groups of people living with HIV; there was no update as of December 2019.

HIV and tuberculosis (TB) coinfection in Myanmar

Myanmar is one of 14 countries that carry a high burden of TB/HIV coinfection (of 30 countries globally) as well as multi-drug resistant TB and TB infection.75

In 2018, 3,700 people with HIV died as a result of TB. In the same year, 15,000 people with HIV developed active TB, of whom 10,500 were diagnosed or notified.76 In 2017, 12% of people beginning treatment for HIV also had active TB.77 TB preventative therapy remains widely unavailable in Myanmar, with only 17% of people on HIV treatment accessing it as of 2017.78

In 2016 the WHO and UNAIDS carried out an in-depth review of the status of tuberculosis and HIV coinfection in Myanmar. The key recommendations of the review, which was shared with Myanmar’s Ministry of Health, focused on the importance of strengthening collaboration between HIV and TB national programmes, through improved information sharing, joint procurement and adequate deployment of human resources.

Furthermore, increasing and decentralising the number of health facilities which provide joint screenings and treatment of patients for HIV and TB at all levels of the health system (through scaling up of services and employing mobile teams, particularly in high burden areas) are central to ensuring that these diseases and coinfections are detected early, properly treated and further reduced.79

HELP US HELP OTHERS

Avert.org is helping to prevent the spread of HIV and improve sexual health by giving people trusted, up-to-date information.
Barriers to the HIV response in Myanmar

Financial barriers

Total health expenditure in Myanmar (2-2.4% of its GDP) is among the lowest in the Southeast Asia and Western Pacific regions, which goes some way to explaining the country’s HIV incidence. Likewise, an analysis of countries from different regions, and with varying epidemic patterns, found that Myanmar was among the countries where funding of effective and focused primary HIV prevention was insufficient.

Structural barriers

There are plans to move HIV treatment services to government-run facilities but as yet critical supply chain and human resource needs that would make such a transition viable have not been addressed. This means that key affected populations, such as people who inject drugs, are being left behind in terms of service reach.

As well as these limitations, service delivery and supply chains are set up to operate separately within the healthcare system. This means human resources such as community health workers and service delivery at health facilities remain distinct from one another.

Legal barriers for sex workers

Sex work in Myanmar is illegal and fear of prosecution, harassment and blackmail all reduce access to services such as HIV testing. In 2016, only 50% of sex workers in the country accessed testing. Until 2011, even carrying a condom could be used as circumstantial evidence if a sex worker was detained by the police. More recent records from 2017 indicate that around 80% of sex workers use condoms with clients.

One day, the police detained me and I had to pay a MMK 50,000 fine for my release next day. If I did not pay, I could be detained, sued and jailed.

- Sex worker, Myanmar

---
Legal penalties for commercial sex work are just one of many social and structural barriers – alongside cultural stigma, discrimination and violence – preventing sex workers from accessing necessary HIV prevention and treatment services.87

Same-sex sexual activity is also illegal, punishable with up to 14 years in prison.88 In addition, a host of other laws are used to persecute people for their sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, helping to create a hostile environment for men who have sex with men and other LGBT people. Many LGBT people are further isolated by physical, verbal and sexual assault they experience at the hands of police, health workers and others in authority, as well as members of the general public, which keeps them away from essential HIV prevention, testing and treatment services.89

Stigma and discrimination

There is currently no welfare or job support for people living with HIV in Myanmar, and many face family or community rejection as a result of their status. Stigma within communities largely appears to stem from a lack of public health education and misconceptions on how HIV is spread.

We've seen cases where if someone looking after a patient with HIV dies while the patient is unwell, other people don't want to take care of the person with HIV anymore.

- Soe Yadanar, Medecins Sans Frontieres (MSF)90

This stigma also persists within healthcare systems themselves, with reports of institutional neglect by nurses and doctors also being cited by patients living with HIV.

For example, a 2015 report assessing hospital conditions of people living with HIV in Myanmar and Cambodia found some patients were relegated to segregated waiting areas and bed spaces after their status was discovered.91

The same report also presented more serious allegations, made by women living with HIV, who were forced by healthcare providers into making sterilisation a condition for accessing pregnancy-related services. In one instance in the city of Yangon, they also found that one woman was sterilised without her knowledge or consent.92

The stigma surrounding HIV in Myanmar causes many HIV positive people to stay away from treatment services until their health declines. This not only increases their risk of serious illness and death, something effective antiretroviral treatment prevents, it also increases the likelihood of onward transmission.93

Funding for HIV in Myanmar

Myanmar remains largely dependent on international sources to fund its HIV response.94 Although domestic funding for HIV has increased in recent years, the country's low overall investment in public health remains a major barrier to the success of HIV testing, prevention and treatment programmes.
Historically, the private sector – through international and local NGOs – has played a major role in service delivery. Myanmar’s National Strategic Plan is focused on the development of sustainable partnerships which call for the public and private sector and communities to collaborate to design, deliver, monitor and evaluate services.

The National Strategic Plan estimated that US$460 million was needed to fund Myanmar’s HIV response between 2016 and 2020. This is a 16% decrease from the previous plan and has been achieved by reducing the number of organisations and agencies implementing HIV services.

The single largest financing source of the HIV response in Myanmar remains the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. In 2017, of a total of US$106.5 million available for the country’s HIV response, the Global Fund provided around US$51 million. Domestic funds provided around US$22 million (US$20 million from public funds, US$2 million from private sources), other international donors provided a further US$20.5 million and the US President’s Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPAR) provided around US$12 million.

Despite the reliance on external funds, international donor support for Myanmar’s HIV response is decreasing. In 2015 the Government of Australia withdrew support and in 2017 the 3MDG Fund wound up, leaving a large gap in resources for HIV prevention, particularly for people who inject drugs, one of the most key affected populations.

In 2018, the government’s increased financial commitments and management responsibility to a more integrated HIV response and a rapid expansion of services also raised concerns about how to optimise resources and bridge gaps in service quality. Successful implementation requires an increase in national resources that is beyond the capacity of the government and donor commitments.

The future of HIV in Myanmar

Like many other low- and middle-income countries, there is a long way to go if Myanmar is to come close to the UNAIDS targets for ending the epidemic by 2030. However, there is some optimism that targets for reducing transmission and increasing treatment can be achieved with increased national and international funding and support.

To control the epidemic, preventing new infections among people from key populations must be prioritised. To this end, the government of Myanmar is looking to adopt new biomedical solutions, such as introducing PrEP. However, some critics suggest that treatment access for those living with HIV should be prioritised first before implementing new methods in prevention:

[Myanmar is] a country where only 60% of people living with HIV can access treatment; WHO describe universal access to treatment as minimum 80% coverage. It’s a heavily resource-constrained setting and there isn’t the capacity to deliver PrEP appropriately.

- Associate Professor Mark Stoové from the Burnet Institute
What is clear is that biomedical solutions alone will not end Myanmar’s HIV epidemic. While people from key population groups remain criminalised and discriminated against they will continue to avoid publicly-run HIV services. The high proportion of new infections among young people from key population groups is also of grave concern. Unless addressed through the provision of prevention, testing and treatment services designed to meet vulnerable young people’s needs, this worrying trend could see some of the gains made in recent years begin to reverse.

1. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed August 2020)
2. ibid
3. ibid
4. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed August 2020)
6. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed August 2020)
7. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
8. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed August 2020)
11. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
17. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
20. UNAIDS ‘AIDS Data 2019’, p.184-5.[pdf]
24. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)

27. ibid

29. ibid

34. ibid

38. ibid

40. ibid

42. Aids Health ‘Myanmar’ (accessed December 2019)

44. HIVST.org ‘Myanmar’ (accessed December 2019)

46. UNAIDS ‘AIDS Data 2019’, p.184-5.[pdf]

60. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
61. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
64. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
65. ibid
66. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
67. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
68. UNAIDS ‘AIDS Data 2019’, p.141. [pdf]
69. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
77. UNAIDS ‘AIDSinfo’ (accessed December 2019)
78. ibid
79. WHO ‘WHO and UNAIDS conduct a review of HIV and TB collaborative activities in Myanmar together with the Ministry of Health’ (accessed December 2019)
80. World Health Organisation ‘Newsletter: April - June 2016’
85. UNAIDS ‘AIDS Data 2019’, p.184-5.[pdf]
88. UNAIDS ‘AIDS Data 2019’, p.184-5.[pdf]
89. Equality Myanmar (2019) ‘In the shadows: Systemic injustice based on sexual orientation and gender identity or expression in Myanmar’ [pdf]
92. ibid
98. UNAIDS ‘AIDS Data 2019’, p.184-5.[pdf]
Last full review: 15 January 2020
Next full review: 15 January 2023
EXHIBIT 12
Background

Epidemic in Myanmar

- Estimated 224,794 people living with HIV in 2015\(^1\)
- HIV prevalence in general population 0.60% in 2015\(^2\)

Key population (KP) size estimates\(^3\)

- 83,000 people who inject drugs (PWID)
- 66,000 female sex workers (FSW)
- 253,000 men who have sex with men (MSM)

---

\(^1\) AEM spectrum, April 2016
\(^3\) IBBS, 2014 & 2015
Background

- Increasing access to HIV testing and counseling (HTC) services for key populations is a critical point in the cascade to reach 90-90-90 targets.
- In mid-2014, the Myanmar National AIDS Program decentralized HTC services.
- Allowed trained NGO health care personnel to provide HTC at fixed sites (drop-in centers and clinics) and mobile/outreach settings.
- Cadres including doctors, nurses, and lab technicians.
- After training, health care personnel conduct HIV rapid testing and provide same-day results.
Background

With support from GF, SCI-PR sub-recipient NGOs provide services to KP in 175 out of 330 townships.

Methods

- Aggregate data reported from NGOs were compiled and analyzed
  - trends in # of tested
  - proportion of positive results

- Population subgroups
  - FSW
  - MSM
  - PWID
  - Other vulnerable populations
    ( Partners of KP, Clients of FSW, Drug User & Others)

- Studied periods: Jul-Dec 2013 to Jan-Jun 2016
Results

- HIV testing increased following HTC decentralization.

- 120% increase between Jan-Jun 2014 (25,814) and Jan-June 2016 (56,742).

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th># of HIV testing in Jan-June 2014</th>
<th>25814</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td># of HIV testing in Jan-June 2016</td>
<td>56742</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td># of testing increased</td>
<td>+30928</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>% of testing increased</td>
<td>120%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

!Graph showing HIV testing increase
Results

HIV positivity in the population sub groups

- MSM: 13.1%
- FSW: 5.2%
- PWID: 0%
- Other Vulnerable Population: 5%

Results of:
- "Clients of FSW ", "Drug User", "Partner of KP " and "Others"

Positivity among Other Vulnerable Population 2015

- Partner of KP: 17%
- DU: 9%
- Others: 7%
- Clients of FSW: 6%

Positivity of Other Vulnerable Population by area 2015

- Gold Mine/Jade Area: 25%
- Border Area: 19%
- Other Area: 7%
KP are reluctant to disclose their KP status due to widespread stigma and discrimination.

Disaggregation by location revealed high positivity at border regions and mining areas where migrants, miners, truck drivers, and entertainment workers are found.

There are unique challenges to deliver HIV prevention services in these areas.
Limitations

- Representativeness
  - Programmatic data
  - Sub-national

Recommendations

- Continue targeting partners of KP, clients of FSW, and non-injecting drug users.

- Provide tailored services to mobile populations: migrant workers, fishermen, truck drivers, and entertainment workers.

- Increase access to HIV services in gold and jade mines.

- Development of innovative strategies to facilitate disclosure of risk status, including modification of counseling protocols.

- Further research on other vulnerable populations to inform effective interventions.
Disclosure Statement

Save the Children is a Principal Recipient of The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria (GFATM) in Myanmar. The authors declare no conflict of interest.

For further information, contact:

Sai San Moon Lu, Senior Coordinator for Monitoring & Evaluation, saisanmoon.lu@savethechildren.org

Thank You
RESEARCH ARTICLE

Young key affected population in Myanmar: are there any challenges in seeking information and care for HIV/sexually transmitted infections and reproductive health? [version 2; peer review: 2 approved]

Kyaw Min Htut , Myo Myo Mon , Zin Mar Aye, Lwin Lwin Ni

Department of Medical Research, Ministry of Health and Sports, Yangon, 11191, Myanmar

Abstract

Background: Unmet needs and barriers in seeking HIV/STI and RH information and care are present especially among young key affected population (YKAP). Therefore, the study was conducted to determine the health seeking behaviors of YKAP regarding HIV/STI and RH, and challenges in seeking health information and care.

Methods: A cross-sectional, mixed-methods study was conducted at two large cities in Myanmar. Face-to-face interviews were conducted with YKAP aged 15-24 years. In-depth interviews and key informant interviews were done with YKAP and health care providers. Descriptive statistics and bivariate analyses were done for quantitative data and thematic analysis was applied for qualitative data.

Results: A total of 119 young men who have sex with men (YMSM) and 123 young female sex workers (YFSW) included in the study. Mean age of YMSM and YFSW were 20.9±2.4 and 21.7±2.2 years. Over 30% of YMSM and 49.3% of YFSW had experience of any STI symptom. Particularly, 17% of YMSM and 10% of YFSW had genital ulcer, and majority sought health care at NGO clinics. About 37% of YMSM and 40% of YFSW visited Drop-in-center (DIC) within one to six months. Over 13% of YMSM and 14.6% of YFSW had challenges in seeking HIV/STI and RH information. YMSM/YFSW type and age of YMSM were associated with visit to DIC. Lesser proportions of Tha-ngae (43.5%), younger age YMSM (66.7%), brothel-based YFSW (47.9%) visited DIC than others (p<0.05). Challenges and unmet needs expressed by YKAP were reluctance in asking health information, worry for future fertility, consequences of anal sex and contraception. Challenges expressed by providers were limited time during outreach service and difficulty in reaching entertainment-based sex workers.

Conclusions: Special attention in provision of health information should be paid to YKAP since there is a considerable proportion of YKAP with unmet need in seeking HIV/STI/RH information and care.
Keywords
Young Key Affected Population, Men who have sex with men, Female sex workers, HIV, Sexually Transmitted Infection, Reproductive Health, Myanmar

Corresponding author: Kyaw Min Htut (kyawminhtut@gmail.com)

Author roles: Htut KM: Conceptualization, Formal Analysis, Funding Acquisition, Investigation, Methodology, Project Administration, Resources, Software, Supervision, Validation, Visualization, Writing – Original Draft Preparation, Writing – Review & Editing; Mon MM: Conceptualization, Data Curation, Formal Analysis, Investigation, Methodology, Project Administration, Software, Supervision, Validation, Visualization, Writing – Original Draft Preparation, Writing – Review & Editing; Aye ZM: Formal Analysis, Investigation, Software, Visualization; Ni LL: Formal Analysis, Investigation, Resources, Software

Competing interests: No competing interests were disclosed.

Grant information: The current study was fully funded by the World Health Organization.

Copyright: © 2018 Htut KM et al. This is an open access article distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution Licence, which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original work is properly cited. Data associated with the article are available under the terms of the Creative Commons Zero "No rights reserved" data waiver (CC0 1.0 Public domain dedication).

How to cite this article: Htut KM, Mon MM, Aye ZM and Ni LL. Young key affected population in Myanmar: are there any challenges in seeking information and care for HIV/sexually transmitted infections and reproductive health? [version 2; peer review: 2 approved]
Introduction
Globally, one-fourth of the total population is young people aged 10–24 years, and they are most vulnerable from the global epidemic of HIV. Around one-third of all new HIV infections worldwide occurred among youth aged 15–24 years and about five million people aged 10–24 years were infected with HIV. As described in latest census of Myanmar in 2014, the total population is 51.4 million, with 16 million young people, which accounts for 32% of the population. One of the main health problems faced by young people results from sexual and reproductive health risk-taking behaviors, leading to unintended pregnancies and HIV/AIDS.

Key affected populations in relation to HIV transmission were men who have sex with men (MSM), sex workers, people who inject drugs, and people in prisons. In Myanmar, according to sentinel surveillance data, HIV prevalence among young key populations was higher than that of other populations. In particular, 5.5% and 7.9% among female sex workers aged 15–19 years and 20–24 years, respectively; and 9.1% and 8.6% among men who have sex with men aged 15–19 years and 20–24 years, respectively. As mentioned in National Strategic Plan on HIV/AIDS for 2016–2020, HIV prevalence among female sex workers (FSW) and MSM were 14.6% and 11.6% respectively according to findings from the Integrated Biological and Behavioral Survey in 2015.

Previous studies have identified factors related to health-seeking behaviors of young people. These factors included stigma and discrimination, long waiting times, inconvenient locations of clinics, not knowing where to get the services, and negative attitudes among health care providers. Globally, there are a number of studies indicating the presence of HIV-related stigma in healthcare settings. Discrimination is a major problem when seeking health care for HIV-infected individuals. Research had found that consequences of HIV-related stigma on health-seeking behavior resulted in fear of receiving HIV testing, and delaying in responses such as adhering to treatment and preventive behaviours. In a study in Laos, the main barriers were related to location of health facility, lack of awareness on availability of services and unfavorable attitude of healthcare providers.

With regards the service utilization, the percentage of FSW who received an HIV test in the last 12 months was 71%, and the percentage of MSM who received an HIV test in the last 12 months was 48%. Reducing the incidence of HIV among priority populations like MSM and FSW was described as one of the objectives to fulfil the goal of the current National Strategic Plan. It was also stated that efforts must be made to tailor services to reach the priority population of young people. However, very few studies have been conducted among the YKAP in Myanmar identifying health-seeking behaviors and their perceived barriers. Therefore, current study was conducted to determine the health seeking behaviors regarding HIV/STI and reproductive health (RH), challenges and the unmet needs in seeking health information among YKAP.

Methods
Study design and setting
A cross-sectional, mixed-methods study was conducted using both quantitative and qualitative methods among the YKAP, including young FSW (YFSW) and young MSM (YMSM) in Yangon and Mandalay, Myanmar, during February and June 2017. Yangon and Mandalay are two largest business cities of Myanmar where the YKAP community is larger than that of other areas.

Participants
Inclusion criteria:
1. YFSW aged 15 to 24 years currently working as sex workers whose sex work was based either at brothels, entertainment places (karaoke, club, bar) or on the streets.
2. YMSM aged 15 to 24 years who identified themselves as apwint (open type) or apone (hidden type) or tha-nge (male partner of either apwint or apone).

Operational definition of MSMS according to their types:
Apwint: Those who are biological males whose public and private gender identity is generally feminine, but they may dress as men or dress and act as females. Apwint are generally more ‘open’ MSM and some could be considered ‘transgender’.
Apone: Those who are biological males whose gender identity may be either masculine or feminine and may or may not express themselves femininely.
Tha Nge: Those who are biological males whose gender identity is masculine with a sexual preference for apwint and apone as well as for women, however they are often ‘hidden’ MSM.

Operational definitions of RH and unmet needs in seeking health information was defined in our study as follows.

Reproductive health and services
According to World Health Organization, “reproductive health addresses the reproductive processes, functions and system at all stages of life and it implies that people are able to have a responsible, satisfying and safe sex life and that they have the capability to reproduce and the freedom to decide if, when and how often to do so”. In present study, we focused only on STI/HIV and the services related to them.

Unmet needs in seeking health information
“Although YKAP wants to know or receive STI/HIV information/care, they could not get/receive information/care as they would like to.”
For example—though they want to know details about the consequences of anal sex, they do not know how to get or from whom they could get the information.

Variables

Outcome variables
Health-seeking behavior was measured on

1. Ever receive HIV testing (Yes/No)
2. STI treatment (Yes/No)
3. Visit to DIC (Yes/No)

Independent variables

1. Age: both continuous and categorical measurement
2. Type of MSM: either apwint, apone or thange (as defined above)
3. Type of FSW: either brothel-based, entertainment-based or street-based
4. Education: either illiterate, read & write, primary school, middle school, high school, university
5. Having income earning job: either yes, not always or no
6. Any STI symptoms: yes or no

Challenges and unmet needs were mainly discussed during in-depth interviews and key informant interviews.

Sampling and sample size

Purpose sampling was applied in recruiting YMSM and YFSW since they were hidden population and could not be easily accessible like general population. Firstly, identification of the places for recruitment of the possible participants was made after discussion with the focal persons from the networks of FSW and MSM. FSWs were recruited from brothels, massage parlors, karaoke and soliciting sites on the streets according to the inclusion criteria. MSMs were recruited at beauty salons and gathering places along the streets. No recruitment was done through clinics and drop-in centers (DIC) to prevent bias in sampling those with good health-seeking behavior. Participants for qualitative interviews were selected based on the type of YMSM and YFSW, their experience of barriers/unmet needs and their willingness to participate in the interviews.

Considering proportions of MSM and FSW who seek HIV testing service in last 12 months as 20% and 30% according to a previous study, 95% confidence level, precision of 0.1 and design effect of 1.5, the minimum required sample size for each population were 93 (YMSM) and 122 (YFSW) by using a sample size formula for one proportion.

Data collection

Research assistants were trained at the Department of Medical Research before field data collection. A structured questionnaire was developed for quantitative assessment and face-to-face interviews were carried out with YKAP using a structured, pre-tested questionnaire by trained interviewers. Guidelines were developed for in-depth interviews (IDIs) and key informant interviews (KIIs). In-depth interviews were conducted with YKAP and key informant interviews were carried out with the service provider to explore their opinions and experiences. Service providers are the focal persons from National AIDS Program and non-governmental organization (NGO)/international NGO working for the key populations. These IDIs and KIIs were conducted by two principal investigators who have experience of conducting qualitative interviews. Because of confidentiality issues, the interviews were not audio recorded. However, discussions were noted down by well-trained note takers. Two note-takers also have previous experience of dealing with key populations and they were mainly trained on how to strictly ensure and value confidentiality of the study population.

A total of 119 face to face interviews with YMSM and 123 face to face interviews with YFSW were carried out using a structured questionnaire. In addition, 12 IDI and 10 KII were conducted with service providers and focal persons. (Supplementary File 1, Supplementary File 2), (Supplementary File 3)

Main themes included in IDIs and KIIs were as follows:
- perspective on young key affected population
- challenges in receiving/providing RH/HIV information and health care
- unmet needs in receiving RH/HIV information and health care

Data management and analysis

Data entry was conducted using EpiData version 3.1 and analysis was conducted with SPSS version 16 for quantitative data. Descriptive statistics were shown as frequency/percentage for categorical variables and mean/median for continuous variables. Bi-variate analysis was done using the chi-squared test.

Regarding the qualitative data, transcripts were prepared and manual coding was applied to explore the main themes such as unmet needs and barriers in seeking HIV/STI and other RH information. Manual thematic analysis was done by using matrix according to the themes and type of participants.

Ethical consideration

Verbal informed consent was obtained from each participant after thorough explanation about the objectives of the study. Regarding the participants below 18 years, we have to request their consents directly since it was not possible to ask from their guardians. Anonymity and confidentiality of the information were ensured using the code numbers and only researchers have accessed to the information. Ethics approval was also obtained from the Ethics Review Committee of The Department of Medical Research (Ethics/DMR/2016/091), Ministry of Health and Sports, Myanmar.

Results

Participant characteristics
Socio-demographic characteristics and family related information of participants are shown in Table 1. A total of 119 young men
Table 1. Background characteristics and family-related information of the participants.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Characteristics</th>
<th>YMSM (n=119), n (%)</th>
<th>YFSW (n=123), n (%)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Age, years</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mean ± SD</td>
<td>20.9 ± 2.4</td>
<td>21.7 ± 2.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Range</td>
<td>16 – 24</td>
<td>16 – 24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Education</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Illiterate</td>
<td>3 (2.5)</td>
<td>16 (13.0)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Read &amp; write</td>
<td>7 (5.9)</td>
<td>25 (20.3)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Primary school</td>
<td>26 (21.8)</td>
<td>51 (41.5)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Middle school</td>
<td>49 (41.2)</td>
<td>29 (23.6)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>High school</td>
<td>10 (8.4)</td>
<td>1 (0.8)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Graduate/University</td>
<td>24 (20.2)</td>
<td>1 (0.8)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marital status</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Married</td>
<td>32 (27.1)</td>
<td>30 (24.4)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Not married</td>
<td>85 (71.2)</td>
<td>56 (45.5)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Divorced</td>
<td>2 (1.7)</td>
<td>37 (30.1)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Have income earning job</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yes, always</td>
<td>87 (73.1)</td>
<td>15 (12.2)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yes, not regular</td>
<td>18 (15.1)</td>
<td>5 (4.1)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No</td>
<td>14 (11.8)</td>
<td>103 (83.7)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monthly income, Kyats</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No income</td>
<td>12 (10.1)</td>
<td>-</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Up to 1000,000</td>
<td>18 (15.1)</td>
<td>6 (4.9)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&gt;100,000 – 200,000</td>
<td>53 (44.5)</td>
<td>46 (37.4)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&gt;200,000 – 500,000</td>
<td>28 (23.5)</td>
<td>53 (43.1)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&gt;500,000</td>
<td>8 (6.7)</td>
<td>18 (14.6)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Current living conditions</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parents/Guardians</td>
<td>76 (53.9)</td>
<td>49 (39.9)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Friends/colleagues</td>
<td>22 (18.4)</td>
<td>66 (53.7)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Partner</td>
<td>13 (1.1)</td>
<td>5 (4.1)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alone</td>
<td>8 (6.7)</td>
<td>3 (2.4)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parents/Guardians accepted as MSM/FSW</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Accepted</td>
<td>67 (56.3)</td>
<td>27 (22.0)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Not accepted</td>
<td>21 (17.6)</td>
<td>17 (13.8)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Don’t know their status</td>
<td>31 (26.1)</td>
<td>79 (64.2)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

YMSM, young men who have sex with men; YFSW, young female sex workers.

who have sex with men (YMSM) and 123 young female sex workers (YFSW) included in the assessment. The mean age of YMSM and YFSW was 20.9±2.4 and 21.7±2.2 years, respectively. Nearly 60% of YMSM were apwint (open type), 21.8% were apone (hidden type) and 19.3% were tha-nge (male partner of apwint or apone) as identified by themselves. Based on the place of sex work, YFSW included in the study were identified as brothel-based (40%), entertainment-based (karaoke/restaurant/nightclub/massage) (32.5%) and street-based (28.5%) respectively.

Regarding their education status, 72.3% and 86.2 % of YMSM and YFSW, respectively, had completed primary school education, and 8.4% of YMSM were university graduates. Around one-fourth of both YMSM (27.1%) and YFSW (24.4%) were married. Median monthly income of YMSM and YFSW were 200,000 Kyats and 300,000 Kyats, respectively. Over 50% of YMSM and about 40% of YFSW were currently living with their parents. More than half of YMSMs’ parents/guardians accepted their sexual identity as MSM while only 22% of YFSWs’ parents/guardians accepted them as sex workers.

Sexual health of participants

Figure 1 describes the STI symptoms experienced by YMSM and YFSW; genital ulcer was most common for YMSM while white discharge was most common for YFSW. In particular, past incidence of genital ulcers was reported by 17% of YMSM and 11% of YFSW. Over 21% of YFSW suffered from white discharge while 7.6% of YMSM suffered from urethral discharge. Additionally, lower abdominal pain was also common in YFSW (18.7%). Table 2 shows the health-seeking behaviors of YMSM and YFSW regarding RH, STI and HIV. About 70% of YMSM and 56% of YFSW had experience of health-seeking for STI symptoms and the majority of them go to NGO clinics to treat STI. Over 90% of YMSM and YFSW have received HIV testing in the past and over 80% of them had tested for HIV within 6 months. The main reason for undergoing HIV testing is that they would like to know whether they have been infected with HIV or not. Over 90% of both YMSM and YFSW went to an NGO clinic for HIV testing. Regarding the utilization of drop-in centers (DICs), 79% of YMSM and 56.9% of YFSW have ever visited a DIC. Among them, 53.2% of YMSM and 38.6% of YFSW visited a DIC within the previous month.

Figure 2 shows the barriers or limitations in receiving STI/HIV and RH information, and health care seeking. Just over 13% of YMSM and 14.6% of YFSW mentioned that they experience external and personal barriers towards seeking health information on RH. Similarly, 11% of YMSM and 12% of YFSW have barriers in seeking STI/HIV information.

Visit to DICs among YKAP and their background characteristics are shown in Table 3. Type of MSM and age were associated with visiting a DIC among YMSM. A lesser proportion of tha-nge (43.5%) visited a DIC than apwint (85.7%) and apone (92.3%) (p=0.0001). A higher proportion of older YMSM visited DICs in comparing to younger MSM (84.3% vs. 66.7%, p=0.03). Among YFSWs, visiting a DIC was associated with their place of work: a significantly higher proportion of street-based YFSW (77.1%) visited DICs than those who worked in entertainment locations (50%) and brothels (47.9%) (p=0.01).

During in-depth interviews and key informant interviews, different challenges and unmet needs in seeking health information and services were mentioned by YKAP as shown in Table 4. Common challenges mentioned by YMSMs were “financial Table 2. Health seeking behaviours of young men who have sex with men (YMSM) and young female sex workers (YFSW) regarding reproductive health and STI/HIV services.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Characteristics</th>
<th>YMSM (n=119), n (%)</th>
<th>YFSW (n=123), n (%)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Ever have any STI symptom</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>36 (30.3)</td>
<td>54 (49.3)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No</td>
<td>83 (69.7)</td>
<td>69 (56.1)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Experience of health seeking for STI symptoms</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>26 (72.2)</td>
<td>35 (64.8)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No</td>
<td>10 (27.8)</td>
<td>19 (35.2)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Place of seeking health care for STI</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NGO clinic (n=26)</td>
<td>22 (84.6)</td>
<td>25 (71.4)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Private clinic/hospital (n=7)</td>
<td>2 (7.7)</td>
<td>8 (22.9)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Public clinic/hospital (n=7)</td>
<td>2 (7.7)</td>
<td>5 (7.7)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ever received HIV testing</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>112 (94.1)</td>
<td>112 (91.1)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No</td>
<td>7 (5.9)</td>
<td>11 (8.9)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Last time of HIV testing (n=112)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Within 6 months</td>
<td>93 (83.1)</td>
<td>91 (81.3)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6 months–1 year</td>
<td>11 (9.8)</td>
<td>13 (11.6)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&gt;1 year</td>
<td>8 (7.1)</td>
<td>8 (7.1)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

NGO, non-governmental organization; DIC, drop-in clinic.

Figure 1. STI symptoms experienced by young men who have sex with men (YMSM) and young female sex workers (YFSW).

problems” and “discrimination from health care providers”, while YFSWs stated their challenges as “no/limited time to access health service”, “reluctance in asking health information” and “restriction to go outside”. Regarding their unmet needs, most tha-nge (male partners of apwint and apone) expressed their concerns about the health consequences from having sexual relationship with MSM and future fertility. Other MSMs would like to know the consequences of anal sex and its treatment. Similarly, YFSWs also expressed that they have unmet needs concerning their future fertility and contraception. Most providers
Figure 2. Barriers or limitations in receiving STI/HIV and reproductive health (RH) information, and health care seeking. YMSM, young men who have sex with men; YFSM, young female sex workers.

Table 3. Association between background characteristics and visit to drop-in clinics (DICs) among young men who have sex with men (YMSM) and young female sex workers (YFSW).

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Characteristics</th>
<th>Visit DIC</th>
<th>p-value</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Yes, n (%)</td>
<td>No, n (%)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>YMSM (n=119)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Type of MSM</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Apwint</td>
<td>60 (85.7)</td>
<td>10 (14.3)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Apone</td>
<td>24 (92.3)</td>
<td>2 (7.7)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tha-Nge</td>
<td>10 (43.5)</td>
<td>13 (56.5)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Age group</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15–19 years</td>
<td>24 (66.7)</td>
<td>12 (33.3)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20–24 years</td>
<td>70 (84.3)</td>
<td>13 (15.7)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>YFSW (n=123)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Type of YFSW</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brothel-based</td>
<td>23 (47.9)</td>
<td>25 (52.1)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Entertainment based</td>
<td>20 (50.0)</td>
<td>20 (50.0)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Street-based</td>
<td>27 (77.1)</td>
<td>8 (22.9)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Age group</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15–19 years</td>
<td>11 (44.0)</td>
<td>14 (56.0)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20–24 years</td>
<td>59 (60.2)</td>
<td>39 (39.8)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

mentioned that it was difficult to reach and provide services to the girls from entertainment locations, such as karaoke.

Selected quotations included:

“… Currently, I’m living together with “achout” (apwint MSM), but I have a plan to marry a girl in the future.

I worry about my fertility status at that time… afraid that I may not able to procreate …” (IDI 3, tha-nge, 23 years old).

“… We can’t go outside everyday… we’re allowed to go outside for one day per week … only for 2–3 hours …” (IDI 6, FSW, 20 years old).
“… We could educate the girls from brothel … They told us their experiences frankly… But, we couldn’t communicate frankly with the girls from karaoke … most of them didn’t accept …” (KII 2, out-reach health care provider).

Dataset 1. Complete answers to questionnaires for young men who have sex with men and young female sex workers
https://dx.doi.org/10.5256/f1000research.16029.d217070

A key to the coding and abbreviations is also included.

Discussions and conclusions
The current study highlights the health-seeking behaviors, challenges and unmet needs of the YKAP (YMSM and YFSW) regarding reproductive health and STI/HIV services. Experience of any STI symptom was disclosed by some YMSM and YFSW. The majority of YMSM and YFSW have received HIV testing in the past. In addition, both YMSM and YFSW had experience of health-seeking for STI symptoms and majority of them sought health care from NGO clinics. We also found barriers and unmet needs in seeking health information on RH and STI/HIV among YKAP.

Previous studies have documented on the health care seeking behavior among key population like MSM and FSW. Studies conducted in China found that 40–60% of MSM had ever done HIV testing\cite{14-16} while a similar HIV testing rate among FSW was documented in a study done in Nigeria\cite{17}. Moreover, Bartelsman et al. documented that the HIV testing rate was as low as 32.7% among MSM in Amsterdam\cite{18}. In contrast to other studies, much higher proportions of YMSM and YFSW from current study had been tested for HIV in the past. Different socio-economic background, sampling strategy and cultural context might contribute to this discrepancy. However, findings on high HIV testing rates among YMSM was consistent with the previous study done in two large cities of Myanmar, Yangon and Monywa, in 2015\cite{19}. It was also supported by the evidence from the progress report of National AIDs Program in Myanmar, which found that HIV testing rates among MSM and FSW were dramatically increased between 2006 and 2010. Specifically, testing rates tripled in MSM and quadrupled in FSW\cite{20}. In the current study, although the self-reported testing rates were high, we did not ask about the quality of testing services and did not verify these rates by other methods.

Experience of STIs among FSW had been noted in previous studies\cite{20,21}. In Bangladesh, 41.6% of FSW had experience of any STI symptom and many of them had unmet needs for SRH care\cite{22}. A lesser proportion of YFSW from our study also had experience of STI symptoms in the past. On the other hand, 21.4% and 15.4% of MSM from Tanzania and Peru had any past STI symptoms, and similar findings were also identified in the current study\cite{22,23}. However, in our study, experience of STI symptoms was noted according to their responses and was not validated by blood test. Access to RH information, including that concerning HIV/STI, is important for the YKAP.

Unmet needs and the barriers in seeking sexual and reproductive health care was documented in previous studies\cite{24,25}. The prevalence of unmet need was 25% among hotel-based FSW and 36% among street-based FSW according to a study in Bangladesh\cite{26}. Another study also reported that over 50% of FSWs have faced barriers in seeking SRH care\cite{27}. Common barriers included financial problems, shame about receiving care, unwillingness and unfriendly behavior of the provider. Certain proportions of YKAP from current study mentioned that they have challenges in seeking reproductive health information. Similarly, some of them have barriers in seeking STI/HIV information. One of the main barriers YFSW mentioned was “no or limited time to access health services”. To overcome this barrier, we may need to discuss more with the gate keepers like managers, brothel owners to allow them in receiving mobile health care services or DIC services. Reluctance in asking health information was also expressed by YMSM. In this case, health care providers should have to do more counseling to YKAP.

Table 4. Challenges and unmet needs regarding STI/HIV and reproductive health information and care.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Theme</th>
<th>YMSM</th>
<th>YFSW</th>
<th>Provider</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Challenges</td>
<td>Financial problem</td>
<td>No or limited time to access health service</td>
<td>Difficult to reach entertainment-based sex workers</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Discrimination from health care provider</td>
<td>Reluctance in asking health information</td>
<td>Limited time to provide health messages during mobile service</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Difficulty in accessing health care services due to long distance</td>
<td>Restriction to go outside</td>
<td>Little interest to health messages and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Reluctance in asking health information</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unmet needs</td>
<td>Health consequences from having sexual relationship with MSM</td>
<td>Future fertility</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Future fertility</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Consequences of anal sex and treatment</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

YMSM, young men who have sex with men; YFSM, young female sex workers.
The current study has certain limitations. Findings on the information related to STI experience and HIV testing of key population may have some bias since we have to rely on the respondents’ answers and could not validate them by other methods. However, we tried to overcome the limitation by providing a thorough explanation about the study’s objectives. Furthermore, generalization of the study findings to other areas of Myanmar may also have limitations because the study participants were only from two large major cities, where many NGOs/international NGOs are working for these populations.

In conclusion, some YKAP have experienced of STI symptom in the past and many of them went to NGO clinic for seeking care. Moreover, many YKAP have tested for HIV within six months. Lesser proportions of Tha-Nge, younger MSM, brothel and entertainment-based YFSW visited DIC than their counterparts. A considerable proportion of YKAP perceived that they have unmet needs in seeking RH information and care.

Special attention in provision of health information should be paid to the YKAP since there is a considerable proportion of the YKAP with unmet needs in seeking RH information and care. Strengthening of health education activities regarding STI is recommended for YKAP, especially for YFSW who work in entertainment-based locations.

Data availability
Dataset 1. Complete answers to questionnaires for young men who have sex with men and young female sex workers. A key to the coding and abbreviations is also included. DOI: https://doi.org/10.5256/f1000research.16029.d217070.

Transcripts from interviews are not available to maintain the confidentiality of the study subjects.

Grant information
The current study was fully funded by the World Health Organization.

The funders had no role in study design, data collection and analysis, decision to publish, or preparation of the manuscript.

Supplementary material
Supplementary File 1. Questionnaire used to obtain data for young men who have sex with men. Click here to access the data.

Supplementary File 2. Questionnaire used to obtain data for young female sex workers. Click here to access the data.

Supplementary File 3. Guidelines for interviews with service providers and the young key affected population. Click here to access the data.

References

11. UNESCO and Department of Medical Research, Ministry of Health, Myanmar: Multi-level risk and protective factors and HIV-related risk behaviours among young men who have sex with men (YMSM) in Myanmar. 2015. Reference Source

Open Peer Review

Current Peer Review Status: ✔ ✔

Version 2

Reviewer Report 21 November 2018
https://doi.org/10.5256/f1000research.18428.r40596

© 2018 Wahed T. This is an open access peer review report distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution Licence, which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original work is properly cited.

✔ Tasnuva Wahed
College of Public Health Sciences, Chulalongkorn University, Bangkok, Thailand

The abstract of revised article still contained some short forms, such as-RH, STIs without full abbreviation. The authors can write as - reproductive health (RH) when they cite it first (please, see first sentence, background of abstract).

There are no more comments.

Competing Interests: No competing interests were disclosed.

I confirm that I have read this submission and believe that I have an appropriate level of expertise to confirm that it is of an acceptable scientific standard.

Reviewer Report 16 November 2018
https://doi.org/10.5256/f1000research.18428.r40597

© 2018 Than K. This is an open access peer review report distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution Licence, which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original work is properly cited.

✔ Kyu Kyu Than
Burnet Institute, Melbourne, VIC, Australia

I have no further comments to make. The Authors has revised the article according to my comments and suggestions. I am satisfied with their revision.

Competing Interests: No competing interests were disclosed.

I confirm that I have read this submission and believe that I have an appropriate level of expertise to confirm that it is of an acceptable scientific standard.
An interesting and important article related to young key population (YKP) in Myanmar. The article mainly focused on the health seeking behaviours of YKPs (Young men having sex with men and Young female sex workers) in relation to STI treatment and HIV testing. It also seeks the utilization of Drop in centres by YKPs. Following clarifications and amendments are need on the manuscript.

General observation
- Although RH services were included in the objectives, the authors mainly focused on the STI symptoms, HIV testing and DIC utilization.
- The qualitative part of the study was weak in analysis and did not identify the main themes analysed. Was not clear what themes were ask and analysed and what was the added value to the quantitative study.
- Methodology needs to be more elaborated for the mix method studies using specific guidelines for qualitative and quantitative research methods.
- Clearly defining the unmet need for health information seeking is required.

Specific observation

Abstract
- Sample size for the qualitative and quantitative study should be moved to the methodology paragraph.
- Abbreviations should be avoided if possible in the abstract. If need to please specify before using it.

Introduction

As the focus of the study is youth 15 to 24 years, the first paragraph is a bit confusing shifting from 10-24 and 15-24 in the same sentence.

Methods
- There are three main outcome variables that seem to measure the health seeking behaviour. There is a missing variable on obtaining health information. Please clarify.
- Rationale for use of purposive sampling needs to be specified and more details of the sampling and data collection procedures are required. Recruitment of participants for the qualitative study was not mentioned and the sample size for KIIs and IDIs was not observed. Using note takers in the interviews for populations like MSMs and FSWs,how was the breach of confidentiality ensured.
- Advantage of using a mix method study would benefit the study methodology stronger.
- Need to specify the main themes analysed for qualitative thematic analysis.

Results
- There is lack of results on health information seeking. Not clear how many percent try to seek health information and what are the main barriers? Table 4 describes the qualitative analysis but the linkage is missing with the quantitative findings.
- Description of the qualitative findings seems more appropriate if it could be linked to the quantitative data. Very little qualitative information is observed.

Discussion
- Discussions need a conclusion paragraph to draw the main findings and a way forward.

Is the work clearly and accurately presented and does it cite the current literature?
Yes

Is the study design appropriate and is the work technically sound?
Yes

Are sufficient details of methods and analysis provided to allow replication by others?
Partly

If applicable, is the statistical analysis and its interpretation appropriate?
Yes

Are all the source data underlying the results available to ensure full reproducibility?
Yes

Are the conclusions drawn adequately supported by the results?
Yes

Competing Interests: No competing interests were disclosed.

I confirm that I have read this submission and believe that I have an appropriate level of expertise to confirm that it is of an acceptable scientific standard, however I have significant reservations, as outlined above.

---

Author Response 01 Nov 2018

Myo Myo Mon, Department of Medical Research, Ministry of Health and Sports, Yangon, Myanmar

General Observation
Comment: Although RH services were included in the objectives, the authors mainly focused on the STI symptoms, HIV testing and DIC utilization.
Response: Thanks so much for your comments and clarification. You are right that there are many issues under the scope of RH including pregnancy, child birth, abortion, etc. However, in our study, we would like to focus only on STI and HIV since these are most common problems among MSMs and FSWs in Myanmar especially in relation to HIV transmission.

Comment: The qualitative part of the study was weak in analysis and did not identify the main... themes analysed. Was not clear what themes were ask and analysed and what was the added value to the quantitative study.
Response: Thanks for your comments. Our objective for qualitative inquiry is to know their challenges and barriers in seeking health information on HIV/STI. It's aimed to supplement the quantitative information by asking their reasons and perception. Now, we've revised in our manuscript adding the themes we've discussed.

Comment: Methodology needs to be more elaborated for the mix method studies using specific guidelines for qualitative and quantitative research methods.
Response: We've now added more information in the methodology section.

Comment: Clearly defining the unmet need for health information seeking is required.
Response: Now, we had added the operational definition in the manuscript.

Specific observation
Abstract
Comment: Sample size for the qualitative and quantitative study should be moved to the methodology paragraph.
Response: We've already revised in current version.

Comment: Abbreviations should be avoided if possible in the abstract. If need to please specify before using it.
Response: Already revised.

Methods:
Comment: There are three main outcome variables that seem to measure the health seeking behaviour. There is a missing variable on obtaining health information. Please clarify.
Response: We've added the information in current version.

Comment: Rationale for use of purposive sampling needs to be specified and more details of the sampling and data collection procedures are required. Recruitment of participants for the qualitative study was not mentioned and the sample size for KIIs and IDIs was not observed. Using note takers in the interviews for populations like MSMs and FSWs, how was the breach of confidentiality ensured.
Response: Regarding rationale of purposive sampling and sample size for KII & IDI were added in current version of the manuscript. For using note takers in the interviews, we tried our best to ensure confidentiality. Our two note takers are well trained and have experienced in dealing with key population. Aim and objectives of the study were also thoroughly explained to YKAP.

Comment: Need to specify the main themes analysed for qualitative thematic analysis.
Response: we've revised it.

Results:
Comment: There is lack of results on health information seeking. Not clear how many percent try to seek health information and what are the main barriers? Table 4 describes the qualitative analysis but the linkage is missing with the quantitative findings.
Response: In table 2, we've described health seeking for STI, HIV testing and visit to DIC. In this regards, visit to DIC was a proxy measure for health information seeking. Health information seeking was also discussed during the qualitative interview.
Discussion:
Comment: Discussions need a conclusion paragraph to draw the main findings and a way forward.
Response: We’ve added a conclusion paragraph in current version.

Competing Interests: No competing interests were disclosed.

---

Reviewer Report 08 October 2018

https://doi.org/10.5256/f1000research.17506.r38597

© 2018 Wahed T. This is an open access peer review report distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution Licence, which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original work is properly cited.

Tasnuva Wahed
College of Public Health Sciences, Chulalongkorn University, Bangkok, Thailand

Comments:
This is an important article in the field of sexual and reproductive health research, especially on sexually transmitted infections (STIs) and AIDS. This study intended to document the health seeking behaviours including barriers in health seeking and access to SRH information among young key populations, eg., female sex workers (FSWs), men having sex with men (MSMs) who were 15 to 24 years old in two cities of Myanmar. Following clarifications are needed on this script:

General observations:
- Need a clear operational definition of reproductive health (RH) and services? The author only described about STI and HIV. There are other RH problems of FSWs, such as-unintended pregnancies or childbirth, abortion etc. Did the authors exclude these RH problems from their study?
- Need a clear definition of unmet needs in seeking health information. How did they calculate unmet need of seeking health information?
- Need separately discuss about qualitative and quantitative data collection methods in the methodology.
- Need one paragraph conclusion at the end of this script. At current state, it is finished with limitations following recommendations without a conclusion.

Specific observations:

Abstract:
- Background: Please, use full abbreviation at first once before you use short term like sexually transmitted infections (STIs), reproductive health (RH) etc.
- Methods: What is the study period? How many face to face interviews, in-depth interviews and key informant interviews were conducted? What is the main outcome variable?

Introduction:
- What is the proportion of young key infected populations in Myanmar? If this information is not available, what proportion key infected populations of total population were reported in most recent national census or survey?

Methods:
Operational definition: As mentioned earlier, please, define RH seeking behaviour Variables: You have only three outcome variables which are 1) ever receive HIV testing 2) STI treatment 3) Visit to DIC. But you have an objective to determine in seeking health information, therefore, you should have one variable “access to SRH information or seeking health information”.
Sampling: What is the reason of choosing purposive sampling?
How sample size of qualitative interviews (eg., in-depth interviews and key informant interviews) were determined?
As mention earlier, please describe separately and clearly each method of data collection including sampling, sample size, development of questionnaires/ qualitative guidelines, data collection procedure
Data analysis: Please, describe details of qualitative data analysis.
Ethical consideration: Were verbal or written informed consents taken? What measures were taken to take consents from participants who were aged below 18 years old?

Results:
- You just showed reported barriers in seeking STI/HIV information in Figure 2. Before that, did you measure what proportion of participants accessed to STI/HIV information?
- Table 4: “No or limited time to access health services”- this statement is not clear. Does it mean that YFSW do not have time or have limited time to access health services? If it is so, do you discuss this point how policy makers or health programme can overcome this problem?
- Table 4: “Reluctance in asking health information”- same comment above that this statement is not clear. Does it mean that YFSW kept reluctance in asking health information to healthcare providers? If it is so, do you discuss this point how policy makers or health programme can overcome this problem?

Discussion:
- Last sentence of 2nd paragraph: “In the current study, although the self-reported testing rates were high, we did not ask about the quality of testing services and did not verify these rates by other methods.”- do you please, justify why you did not take measures on quality and verification of self-reported testing services? How this limitation can be overcome in your study?
- Please, include a concluding paragraph.

Is the work clearly and accurately presented and does it cite the current literature?
Yes

Is the study design appropriate and is the work technically sound?
Partly

Are sufficient details of methods and analysis provided to allow replication by others?
Partly

If applicable, is the statistical analysis and its interpretation appropriate?
Yes

Are all the source data underlying the results available to ensure full reproducibility?
Yes

Are the conclusions drawn adequately supported by the results?
Yes

Competing Interests: No competing interests were disclosed.
I confirm that I have read this submission and believe that I have an appropriate level of expertise to confirm that it is of an acceptable scientific standard, however I have significant reservations, as outlined above.

Author Response 01 Nov 2018

Myo Myo Mon, Department of Medical Research, Ministry of Health and Sports, Yangon, Myanmar

Comment: Need a clear operational definition of reproductive health (RH) and services? The author only described about STI and HIV. There are other RH problems of FSWs, such as unintended pregnancies or childbirth, abortion etc. Did the authors exclude these RH problems from their study?
Response: Thanks so much for your comments and clarification. You are right that there are many issues under the scope of RH including pregnancy, childbirth, abortion, etc. However, in our study, we would like to focus only on STI and HIV since these are most common problems among FSWs community in Myanmar especially in relation to HIV transmission. We had revised our manuscript by adding operational definition of RH and services.

We also revised the following facts according to your comment “Need a clear definition of unmet needs in seeking health information. How did they calculate unmet need of seeking health information?”
Response: Since our main focus was on STI and HIV, participants were requested to respond about their unmet needs in seeking health information regarding STI/HIV. Operational definition of unmet needs in seeking health information was defined in our study as follows.
“Although YKAP wants to know or receive STI/HIV information/care, they could not get/receive information/care as they would like to.”
For example- though they want to know details about the consequences of anal sex, they do not know how to get or from whom they could get the information.

Comment: Need separately discuss about qualitative and quantitative data collection methods in the methodology.
Response: According to your suggestion, we revised our manuscript by describing separately about quantitative and qualitative methods.

Comment: Need one paragraph conclusion at the end of this script. At current state, it is finished with limitations following recommendations without a conclusion.
Response: I think, conclusion is already included together with recommendation. However, we’re revising by adding conclusion statement.
“In conclusion, some YKAP have experienced of STI symptom in the past and many of them went to NGO clinic for seeking care. Moreover, many YKAP have tested for HIV within six months. Lesser proportions of Tha-Nge, younger MSM, brothel and entertainment-based YFSW visited DIC than their counterparts. A considerable proportion of YKAP perceived that they have unmet needs in seeking RH information and care.”

Competing Interests: No competing interests were disclosed.
The benefits of publishing with F1000Research:

- Your article is published within days, with no editorial bias
- You can publish traditional articles, null/negative results, case reports, data notes and more
- The peer review process is transparent and collaborative
- Your article is indexed in PubMed after passing peer review
- Dedicated customer support at every stage

For pre-submission enquiries, contact research@f1000.com
EXHIBIT 14
Drug injection behind widespread HIV infection in Myanmar

Xinhua /
YANGON (Xinhua) – Intravenous injections have caused widespread HIV infection in Myanmar’s Sagaing region, local media quoted regional government Minister of Social Welfare Dr. Zaw Win as saying Sunday.

About 20.77 percent of HIV-infected patients got the infection due to drug injection, Dr Zaw Win told a ceremony marking the World AIDS Day in Monywa, Sagaing region, the official Global New Light of Myanmar reported on Sunday.

A total of 14 dispensaries in Sagaing are offering methadone to HIV patients and the regional government is providing supervision for conducting HIV blood test and education campaign for migrant workers, youths and prisoners, a region public health official also told the event.

Myanmar has launched a HIV/AIDS Flagship (UHF) project in five regions and states with the highest rate of HIV infection.

With a fund of US$10 million and backed by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID), the two-year project 2018-19 covers Kachin and Shan states and Sagaing, Yangon and Mandalay regions.

The project aims to scale up HIV prevention, testing and treatment services by utilising non-governmental organisations and private sector health providers for people living with HIV and key population people who injected drugs, women sex workers, men and women who are afflicted and transgender people.

According to statistics, there are 224,794 people estimated to be living with HIV in Myanmar, which ranked 25 in the list of global countries having a high rate of HIV prevalence.

The rate of new patients with HIV infection dropped by 26 percent in 2016 from 2010, while the death toll due to AIDS-related disease plunged by 52 percent.

Tags: HIV, Myanmar, Sagaing, World Aids Day, Zaw Win
Discrimination and Fear Hamper HIV Eradication in Myanmar
By RIK GLAUERT  3 November 2017

YANGON — While Myanmar has been celebrating triumphs in controlling its HIV epidemic, the country is facing a new challenge with infection rates among the gay community in major cities among the highest in Asia.

Myanmar’s number of deaths due to the virus have halved in just six years. State Counselor Daw Aung San Suu Kyi touted HIV as an area of “greatest progress” since her government took power last year in her diplomatic address in September.

But as international donors withdraw funding in the wake of the country’s perceived development, the government warned that its HIV program was facing a funding shortfall of US$150 million by 2020—a third of what it says is needed to battle the disease.

The head of UN’s HIV program in Myanmar, Oussama Tawil, said the country could “lose some of the momentum it has gained over the last five years, if current investments decline and other funds are not mobilized.”

With urban centers including Yangon and Mandalay having Asia’s highest rate of gay and bisexual men and transgender women infected with the virus—27 and 22 percent respectively in in 2015—some worry that the funding shortage would further exasperate what experts have described as the latest battle ground in tackling the epidemic.

The percentage of Myanmar’s new infections coming from this community nearly doubled to 13 percent in 2015 from five percent in 2000, making it one of the three populations most at risk to HIV, following people who inject drugs and sex workers.

Health experts said pervasive discrimination against homosexual, bisexual, or transgender people in Myanmar is preventing people from seeking medical help to prevent and treat HIV and Aids.

Intercourse between people of the same sex is illegal in Myanmar with the penal code punishing “carnal intercourse against the order of nature” with up to 14 years in prison.

Living in Fear
After a young man was diagnosed with HIV in 2009, he says he felt like committing suicide.

The 29-year-old from Kyaukme in Shan State who referred to himself as Ko Kyaw Kyaw was forced to quit his job at the restaurant he worked at as the company screened employees for HIV.

Destitute, Ko Kyaw Kyaw could not turn to his family for support—he feared they would neither accept that he had had sex with a man nor that he was HIV positive.

“There was just no one to take care of me,” he told The Irrawaddy.

According to Ko Hla Myat, director of one of Myanmar's largest lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) associations Colors Rainbow, the group is misunderstood by the public and face daily humiliation.

“The majority of Myanmar’s population don’t see them as humans with equal rights, so they experience lack of respect in all aspects of life—at school, at work, in public health, housing, and even within their families,” he told The Irrawaddy.

This pervasive discrimination deters individuals at-risk of HIV infection from seeking prevention and treatment services at public hospitals for fear of humiliation or mistreatment.

Like many of the gay or transgender people living with HIV the Irrawaddy spoke to, Ko Kyaw Kyaw avoided government clinics and instead sought help through an INGO when he became worried about his HIV status.
He said friends told him about humiliation at the hands of health professionals, and that some doctors and nurses were known to reprimand patients and tell them HIV infection was punishment for their “lifestyle.”

For UNAID’s Oussama Tawil, eliminating stigma and discrimination is of utmost importance for Myanmar to hit country targets in bringing the epidemic under control.

“There is a need to continue to raise awareness among law enforcers, health and social-care providers to recognize and uphold rights of men who have sex with men, transgender and others as highlighted in the national plan on AIDS.” he told The Irrawaddy.

Safe Spaces

Instead of public hospitals and government agencies, it is non-governmental and community-based organizations that provide prevention services for people like Ko Kyaw Kyaw. That includes providing information on safe-sex, handing out condoms, and encouraging HIV testing, and health facilities that provide treatment without discrimination.

But many users of LGBT-friendly health centers—such as Aye Nyein Myittar and Population Services International—told The Irrawaddy they feel uneasy over the future of these critical services as global funding dwindles and the government and INGOs struggle to keep up with the costs.

At the centers, counselors work to inform communities about the risks of HIV, the importance of testing and help patients deal with diagnosis and starting treatment—even accompanying them to public hospitals if necessary.
Outreach workers at the centers travel to areas of the city frequented by LGBT, hold group sessions, offer pre- and post-HIV test counselling and have recently began reaching out to people through Facebook, Viber, B-talk and mobile applications popular with gay and bisexual men—quadrupling the number of gay and bisexual men getting tested for HIV and the number testing HIV-positive in just six months.

U Chit Ko Ko, a 60-year old retired natkadaw—a spirit medium that dresses in female attire—was one of the first people in Myanmar to speak out about being HIV positive and openly gay when he found out he had the virus in 2002.

He supported people in the community to get tested before setting up Lotus—one of the first groups to reach out to those at risk.

After working with hundreds of people over more than a decade, he said discrimination and stigma in Myanmar were still preventing vulnerable people from receiving the services they needed.

“Awareness is needed to fight discrimination,” he told The Irrawaddy. “Without talking about LGBT and HIV, you can’t eliminate the disease.”

Topics: Health, HIV, LGBT

---

Rik Glauert

The Irrawaddy

Rik Glauert is a Copy Editor at the English edition of The Irrawaddy.

---

Specials

TIMELINE: China-Myanmar Relations

---

EXHIBIT 16
Youth with HIV suffer in the shadows

MARCH 24, 2017

There are about 10,000 children and adolescents living with HIV in Myanmar and not enough of them are receiving the special care and assistance they need to cope with the disease.

By JARED DOWNING | FRONTIER

IT WAS hard enough for Ma Wint Htin Sar to fit in at high school, even without having to explain the medication she took with her lunch or dealing with not being invited to friends’ birthday parties because parents thought she was dangerous.

But Wint Htin Sar, now 18, was born with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), and she became accustomed to being treated differently. She wasn’t afraid of discrimination – she was afraid of herself.

“I always kept quiet and sat in the back of the room,” she told Frontier. “I didn’t want to be near the other students.”

Back then, Wint Htin Sar understood little about HIV, which can lead to AIDS if not properly treated. She believed the virus could be spread by coughing and sneezing, dog bites, mosquitoes and kissing.
She did not know that it was possible for people with HIV to have full lives, that the medicine she was taking made it all but incommunicable, and that she didn’t have to wear her HIV status like a badge of death.

When she began to receive counselling through a clinic operated by Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF Holland), it changed not only the way she thought about HIV, but about herself. She began to speak up in class, developed a group of friends and even found a boyfriend.

Since graduating, she has worked with the Phoenix Association, a Yangon-based advocacy and resource organisation for people living with HIV, to help others like herself.

“Usually the people I work with don’t have enough confidence. I try to encourage them and tell them that they can live a normal life,” Wint Htin Sar said.

There are between 170,000 and 220,000 people living with HIV and AIDS in Myanmar. The care available to them has greatly improved since the Ministry of Health reported the first case of HIV in the late 1980s.

The Ministry of Health under the National League for Democracy government has continued to expand its HIV program, with more HIV wards and clinics, access to free medication and public education campaigns. These efforts have been supplemented by organisations such as MSF Holland and the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS).
But the estimated 10,000 children born with the virus, many of whom have lost parents to the disease, face a different and often overlooked set of challenges.

“It’s a different kind of pressure that can weigh on these young people,” said Ms Yasmin Rabiyan, communications manager for MSF Holland, which in 2003 became one of the first major NGOs to conduct HIV/AIDS programs in Myanmar.

Children with HIV are likely to live in single parent homes or be raised by other relatives. Many adolescents orphaned by AIDS – UNAIDS estimates the number to be about 110,000 – enter the foster system with the virus. When Frontier visited an HIV/AIDS shelter run by the NLD in South Dagon Township last year, 30 of its 180 residents were children.

It can be very difficult for children to follow the complex anti-retroviral treatment regimen without a full understanding of the disease, Rabiyan said. Among those helped by MSF Holland’s programs, six percent of adults did not respond to “first line” treatment and were moved to the more intensive “second line” therapy.

Among patients aged from 10 to 19, that number almost triples to sixteen percent. Rabiyan believes the higher number is at least partly because children have more trouble following treatment regimens.

“Adhering to that treatment is already a difficult thing for adults. It’s even more for children, especially if they don’t know why they’re doing it,” Rabiyan said.

Young people with HIV need special education, mentoring and counselling tailored to their demographic, she said, but there are few programs aimed at helping adolescents.

“We need psychosocial support for adolescents,” agreed Ko Nay Lin, operation manager for the Phoenix Association. “For their problems with the family, with school friends, boyfriends or girlfriends.”
A 16-year-old boy who was born with HIV attends a sewing class run by Phoenix Association in Hlaing Tharyar Township. (Nyein Su Wai Kyaw Soe | Frontier)

Nay Lin was in his early 20s when he was diagnosed with AIDS in 2003. Even as an adult, he knew almost nothing about the disease. "I wanted to die," he said. "I wanted to commit suicide by jumping in front of a train. There was no counselling."

Access to both treatment and counselling for all age groups has improved greatly in the last decade, but little of it is specifically tailored for adolescents. Although the Phoenix Association does have education and resources for young people with HIV, including a university scholarship program, it has yet to introduce projects designed specially for children, something that executive director U Thiha Kyaing deeply regrets.

"I tried approaching donors and agencies about [funding for adolescents’ programs], but they said 'no'. They have their own criteria and their own targets," he said.

The HIV targets to which Thiha Kyaing was referring are Myanmar’s “key populations”, such as female sex workers, men who have sex with men and injecting drug users, who represent the vast majority living with the virus.

Unfortunately, the 10,000 or so HIV-positive children often remain an afterthought.

“Living in their school community, their romantic life. They will marry someone, they will love someone. How do they deal with this life? How do they overcome these problems?” Thiha Kyaing said. "They need to prepare for life. No agency does that."

Rabiyan said MSF Holland has encountered situations in which teachers have forbidden students from taking medication in the classroom. Wint Htin Sar said her teachers showed understanding, but the parents of other students were sometimes wary about their children going to school with her.

Thiha Kyaing said that although accurate information about the disease is included in the school curriculum. “People want to skip these chapters. They don’t want to have it explained.”
He said that while the longstanding stigma and discrimination against people with the virus has slowly been easing, it remains a spectre in the lives of people with HIV, especially in rural areas and poorer communities. Children with HIV are regarded as dangerous or the products of an immoral household.

The discrimination these children face is unlikely to change when they become adults. Ignorance and discrimination pervades Myanmar neighbourhoods, workplaces and even hospitals, and there remains little legal protection for people with HIV. Thiha Kyaing said Phoenix has helped to draft the nation’s first anti-discrimination law for people with HIV, and is lobbying support for it in Nay Pyi Taw.

The first negative image that children with HIV need to overcome, said Wint Htin Sar, is their own. “They need to know they can live and work as the other people. They need to have confidence in themselves.”

TOP PHOTO: Ma Wint Htin Sar, 18, attends a vocational training class run by Phoenix Association in Hlaing Tharyar Township. (Nyein Su Wai Kyaw Soe | Frontier)

More stories
Striking health staff boycott COVID-19 jabs as the CDM grows

The Civil Disobedience Movement has shuttered hospitals and crippled the COVID-19 response, but striking medics say military rule is far worse for the nation’s health.

BY FRONTIER
Civil servants increasingly quit their desks to resist the coup

After coup, medical workers spearhead civil disobedience campaign Dropping out: COVID-19 pushes children into work
STORIES IN THIS ISSUE

Myanmar enters 2021 with more friends than foes

The early delivery of vaccines is one of the many boons of the country’s geopolitics, but to really take isolationist past.

Will the Kayin BGF go quietly?

The Kayin State Border Guard Force has come under intense pressure from the Tatmadaw over its exte there’s concern the ultimatum could trigger fresh hostilities in one of the country’s most war-torn are

SUBSCRIBE

VIEW ALL ISSUES

BE A FRONTIER MEMBER

Stay on top of Myanmar current affairs with our Daily Briefing and Media M
EXHIBIT 17
People with HIV in Asia ejected from hospitals, women sterilised-study

By Alisa Tang, Thomson Reuters Foundation

BANGKOK, March 15 (Thomson Reuters Foundation) - Some health workers in Asia are refusing to perform surgery and provide services for people living with HIV, and are even expelling patients from hospitals and forcing women to undergo sterilisation, according to grassroots organisations.

In China and Vietnam, discrimination took the form of changing the recommended option for treatment from surgery to topical or oral medication, said the four-country study supported by Asia Catalyst, which provides management training for community-based health organisations.

In Myanmar and Cambodia, patients with HIV were relegated to segregated waiting areas and bed spaces. One HIV-positive woman in Myanmar said doctors told staff not to give her a hospital bed, so she slept for two nights in the barracks for security guards.

“You see the fear and misinformation that’s in the medical setting,” said Gareth Durrant, Asia Catalyst’s Bangkok-based director of capacity building and community initiatives.

The Asia-Pacific region is home to 4.8 million people living with HIV, the majority of them living in 12 countries: China, Cambodia, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Myanmar, Nepal, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, the Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam.
Asia Catalyst trained and supported staff from eight community-based organisations - two each in Cambodia, China, Myanmar and Vietnam. From May to July 2015 the staff interviewed 202 people living with HIV - 149 women, 15 transgender people and 38 men.

Fifty-one interviewees from all four countries reported being denied care after disclosure of their HIV status, including pregnancy-related services for women in Cambodia and general health services for sex workers in Myanmar and Vietnam.

“After going through five days of labour pain, the first hospital was unable to help me and referred me to this hospital. They did not help. Fortunately, I delivered (the baby) on my own in the waiting room,” a woman in the southern Cambodian province of Kampot was quoted as saying in the report.

After their HIV status became known to service providers, some patients - two each from China and Myanmar, and three from Cambodia - were forced to leave the hospital, including a Cambodian woman forced out before she learned how to prevent transmission of HIV to her newborn baby.

Some healthcare providers made sterilisation a condition of providing pregnancy-related services to women with HIV. One woman in Yangon was sterilised without her knowledge or consent, the report said.

“I don’t think anyone was surprised that discrimination happens,” Durrant told the Thomson Reuters Foundation.

“What was interesting was that when you give grassroots organisations the tools to go back to their communities and say what’s going on, document it... they can identify problems they know are happening in the communities and then come back and tell their governments about it.”

CBOs in Myanmar managed to meet health authorities and police to discuss the findings in the Asia Catalyst report, resulting in a recognition by authorities of the need to pay more attention to at-risk populations, Durrant said.

“Communities for a long time said this hospital is bad, or the doctor is not good, but they did not put into a framework of this is a human rights violation that should never have occurred,” he said.

“Once they’ve (the CBO staff) been through training and understand everyone has a fundamental right to health... it changes the narrative from a doctor who was not good to a human rights violation.”

EXHIBIT 18
In Myanmar, stigma and neglect add to HIV misery

May 31st, 2012

By Damir Sagolj

YANGON (Reuters) - The mother and child who touch hands in an overcrowded Yangon hospice are not family, but their tragic history begins in the blood.

Jam, 42, a mother of six, and Kanama, aged 2, are both HIV positive. Abandoned by their families, they must now find comfort in each other, although Jam still yearns for her husband to return to the private HIV hospice in the suburbs of Myanmar’s biggest city.

“He promised to come back but I’m afraid he never will,” said the woman as she burst into tears. She is known in the hospice by her nickname, Jam.

The hospice is home to 182 HIV patients, whose plight demonstrates the painful limits of Myanmar’s new democracy. A reform-minded government has vowed to overhaul a decrepit health system, but little change is likely for HIV/AIDS sufferers, who thanks to social stigma and medical neglect, are shut off in hospices that bring to mind leper colonies.

In 2009, the United Nations estimated 240,000 of Myanmar’s 60 million people were infected with HIV and about 18,000 were dying a year. Neighboring Thailand, with a slightly bigger population, has more than twice the number of people with HIV but access to drugs and greater public acceptance mean that many can lead normal lives.
Jam once lived in Kadon, a fishing village in the impoverished Irrawaddy Delta, with her farmer husband and their six children. In 2008, feeling unwell, she was treated by a self-styled medic, who injected her with a drug.

The needle was dirty and had been used repeatedly. She was probably now HIV positive, although she didn’t suspect it, and her personal tragedy was soon subsumed by a national one: Cyclone Nargis.

The typhoon slammed into the delta in May that year, killing at least 138,000 people, including Jam’s sons, aged 17 and 18. She narrowly escaped, clutching her youngest child, who is six. Nargis wiped her village off the map.

Jam and thousands of other survivors struggled to rebuild their lives. Another four years passed before she fell ill again, this time more gravely, and a hospital referred her to the Yangon hospice. Tests confirmed she had AIDS.

That was two months ago. Jam is mostly alone now. Apart from her six-year-old, her children shun her. Her husband, who is not HIV positive, returned to the farm.

Five or six people from her village were also treated by the same medic and exhibit the same symptoms and weakness, says Jam, but they refuse to be tested for HIV.

Her neighbors would allow her to return to the village, she says. “But they will not talk to me, because they know my illness is dangerous.”

Not that Jam is going anywhere. Weak and skeletal, she can barely walk or talk. She doesn’t eat and is responding poorly to the drugs the hospice gives her.

Her only solace is Kanama, who was brought to the hospice by her father in 2011. He and Kanama’s mother have both since died of AIDS. While her siblings, who are not HIV positive, stay with their grandparents, Kanama is mostly looked after by Thein Htay, 73, who has been a volunteer at the shelter for three years.

The children get better care and more sympathy here, he says, although not always from the shelter’s neighbors.

“They were scared at the beginning and were avoiding people from the centre,” says Thein Htay. “But we explained them what is HIV and how it works. Now, most are much more relaxed - but not all.”

DRUGS AND EDUCATION

The hospice is basic, its bamboo walls decorated with pictures of pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi. Doctors pay visits, but patients cook and clean for themselves, helped by volunteers.

Volunteer Thein Htay expects little help from the government, even that of a reforming President Thein Sein.

“It does not matter what I expect, they will do nothing. So, I don’t expect anything. Just to let us alone, not to disturb us. Things will change only when NLD becomes the government.”

The NLD, or National League for Democracy, won historic by-elections in April by a landslide, sweeping its leader, Suu Kyi, and 42 other members into parliament.

One of the new MPs is Phyu Phyu Thin, the HIV activist who founded the hospice in 2002.

The government threatened to close the centre in 2010 after Health Ministry officials warned of “the possible spread of infectious disease from the patients”, reported the state-run New Light of Myanmar newspaper.

https://www.reuters.com/article/us-myanmar-hiv-idUSBRE84U06420120531
But the centre, which Suu Kyi visited after her release from house arrest in 2010, remains open. A sister hospice nearby is home to another 82 HIV patients.

Phyu Phyu Thin called for the government to increase its health and education budgets to buy more HIV drugs and fight the stigma attached to the disease. “The two most important things are sufficient drugs and health education,” she told Reuters.

Jam’s story of rejection is shockingly common, she says, recalling an HIV sufferer who was left to starve by villagers, then possibly cremated while in a coma. “HIV patients are often left alone and abandoned by the family,” she says.

Doctors Without Borders, a medical aid group, says some 85,000 HIV-infected people in Myanmar are not getting treatment because of a lack of funding, despite an increase in international engagement with the government.

Health workers accused Myanmar’s former military rulers of largely ignoring the disease when it began to spread in the 1990s, particularly among sex workers and drug users.

Some groups predict the situation will only worsen despite more attention on AIDS and the country’s nascent democracy.

The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, is cutting funding worldwide because of a lack of donations, jeopardizing a plan to provide HIV drugs to 46,500 people in Myanmar.

The new government has brought little hope, said Phyu Phyu Thin.

“Actually, nothing has changed. The situation has even declined,” she said, adding that the number of patients in the hospice doubled between 2010 and 2011.